My honorable friend from New Jersey seems to have discussed this case on the theory that the damage resulting from the expedition was the thing for which we received $750,000, or rather, to state it more broadly, because the proportion was a matter with which the Japanese had nothing to do, that the four powers received $3,000,000 for the damage resulting from that particular expedition to their public vessels of war. He shuts one eye tight and only opens the other who reads the treaty in that way, because the first and leading proposition of it is that the Japanese government is held responsible for the damages resulting to the interests of the treaty powers; and, second, for the expenses occasioned by the expedition.

What were the damages resulting to the interests of the treaty powers? Here was the closing or the keeping closed of three or four or five ports that by treaty obligation they had been bound to open years before. Here was the damage resulting to the general interests of American and European commerce by the constant harassing, wherever any of these commercial enterprises touched the shores of Japan, of the people engaged in them. They could not turn the corner of a street but they were in danger of the stiletto; they could not build a house that it was not in danger of being burned down the next night, and it often was. All these things growing and accumulating and culminating, and accompanied by this shutting up of this great passway of commerce, these people say are the damages resulting to the interests of the treaty powers as well as the expenses of the expedition for which the money was paid.

The undersigned representatives of treaty powers, and Sakai Hida no Kami, a member of his second council, invested with plenipotentiary powers by the Tycoon of Japan, animated with the desire to put an end to all reclamations concerning the acts of aggression and hostility committed by the said Mori Daizen since the first of these acts in June, 1863—against the flags of divers treaty powers, and at the same time to regulate definitively the question of indemnities of war.

And this was the 22d of October, 1864, almost a year and a half—

And I take it we all understand that indemnity of war in case of collision covers all the items and respects to which I have referred, the exclusion of commerce from where it was entitled to go; the constant annoyance and harassing of the citizens and subjects of foreign powers, in spite of their treaties to treat them well; all these as well as the closing of these straits.

To regulate definitively the question of indemnities of war of whatever kind—

Everything, in the broadest possible language, every injury that had been committed to American rights, to English, French, and Dutch rights, was to be covered by one lump sum—in respect to the allied expedition to Simonoseki, have agreed and determined upon the four articles following:

1. The amount payable to the four powers is fixed at $3,000,000. This sum to include all claims, of whatever nature, for past aggressions on the part of Nagato, whether indemnities, ransom for Simonoseki, or expenses entailed by the operations of the allied squadrons.

2. The whole sum to be payable quarterly, in installments of one-sixth, or half a million dollars, to begin from the date when the representatives of said powers shall make known to the Tycoon's government the ratification of this convention and the instructions of their respective governments.

3. Inasmuch as the receipt of money has never been the object of the said powers—

And obviously enough, because you cannot estimate in money alone the damage that had been done to their respective rights by this constant system of duplicity and evasion and annoyance and force combined—

3. Inasmuch as the receipt of money has never been the object of the said powers, but the establishment of better relations with Japan, and the desire to place these on a more satisfactory and mutually advantageous footing is still the leading object in view, therefore, if His Majesty the Tycoon wishes to offer, in lieu of payment of the sum claimed, and as a material compensation for loss and injury sustained, the opening of Simonoseki, or some other eligible port in the inland sea, it shall be at the option of the said foreign governments to accept the same, or insist on the payment of the indemnity in money, under the conditions above stipulated.

What happened then? The government of Japan said, "We do not want to open this port. We would a great deal rather square accounts with you down to the 22d of October, 1864, by giving you $3,000,000, than to carry out the spirit of the system that these treaties had inaugurated of opening trade by giving you any spot in the inland sea where you can set your foot on land. You are entitled to go through it; we have prevented you going through it for a year and a half; but when it comes to making a choice between giving you $3,000,000 and opening a port on this inland sea we give you the money." That shows, if the letter of the treaty did not show, that this $3,000,000 was not got as the estimated sum for any special and specific damage to any citizen of the United States or to any vessel or property of the United States. It was the only means left, except that of extermination, so to speak, that these foreign powers had after they had shown this government and its people that they could enforce their rights, of making them feel that it was for their interest to observe treaty stipulations and carry out in good faith the engagements they had entered into with foreign powers.

Mr. THURMAN. Will it interrupt the Senator's line of argument if I ask him a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not in the least. I have no line of argument except to state my views and call the attention of the Senate to these facts.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator has been making an argument of very great force, and now I want to ask him this question. Supposing that he is right, that the money paid to us was properly paid to us and that no good reason exists whatsoever for our returning any of the money to Japan, is that any reason for postponing this bill indefinitely? Is that any reason why the second section of this bill ought not to pass? Is that any reason for opposing anything but the first section of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly not, Mr. President. Nothing I have said is any reason for opposing anything but the first section of the bill, except perhaps an incidental reason; but the first section of course is the main question. On that I have said all that I care to say, because I have only come into this debate incidentally after having heard the question discussed. Then what is the second section?

If this money was rightly obtained, then the question arises whether any part of it ought to be paid to the officers and crews of the Wyoming and the Takiang, which was the hired vessel that went up on the second occasion in 1864. If the money was not rightfully paid and was wrongfully exacted, then, of course, whatever duties we may owe to these gallant sailors should not be satisfied at the expense of the empire of Japan. We should pay them out of our own Treasury if we owe them anything. We must not "rob Peter to pay Paul." But if, as I most sincerely believe, there is no ground either of public law or of public morals, when you read the whole history of this affair, upon which Japan could justly claim, or, to state it in a fairer way, upon which we could justly feel that we were under any obligation to return this money, the question arises then, as the Senator says, whether it is worth while to postpone the bill indefinitely because the second section provides (the money being ours) to pay a part of it to these officers and crews. That raises the question how far the officers and crews of the public vessels of the United States are entitled to special rewards beyond those that the statutes give them.

I think that states the question fairly. In warfare upon land, as we all know, except in cases of loot, which are extreme cases nowadays and those that ought not to be encouraged, the officers and soldiers of the Army, who, in a certain sense, are exposed to equal peril with the sailors, and on the whole to greater peril when you sum up the number of days in a given year when the soldier is exposed to death from the enemy and the sailor is not, get nothing; they claim nothing. We may capture a city, as General Sherman did Savannah, with millions of public property—not private property, the loot of the soldier, as in the case of sacking a town—but property of the Confederated States, so called. I have never heard it claimed by officers and soldiers of the Army that they were entitled to any share of this public confederate property that was captured; and I am bound to say it for the honor and credit of the Navy that I have never or very rarely indeed—I do not remember an instance—heard it claimed by the officers and sailors of the Navy that they ought to have a single penny beyond that which the fixed laws at the time they performed their services gave them for the service performed.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask the Senator whether he heard the cases which I read to-day?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not.

Mr. THURMAN. That accounts for the remark.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I will ask my honorable friend, as he is asking questions, what were the cases to which he referred? I was unhappily obliged to be absent from the Chamber while he was speaking and hoped to get back in season.

Mr. THURMAN. I read quite a number; but take one single case, and I think the Senator will remember it; we gave to the officers and crew of the Kearsarge the full value of the Alabama.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Ah, Mr. President, now I understand the Senator, I think. He did not pay very exact attention to precisely what I was saying.

Mr. THURMAN. We gave Commodore Decatur and others the values of the Algerine vessels.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I certainly hope the Senator did not suppose I was so ignorant of our history in legislation as not to know that we had often given money. My statement was that I did not remember an instance in which the officers and crew of any one of the public vessels of the United States had claimed anything more than the statutes in force at the time gave them; but as a matter of gratitude for deeds of extraordinary gallantry and heroism, having it may be historic as well as personal effects connected with them, as in the case of the Kearsarge, and in the instance it may be of Decatur, Congress has, not upon demand but out of the gratitude of its heart and the gratitude of the hearts of the people, voluntarily bestowed upon these persons certain proportions or equivalents for the service they had performed.

Mr. THURMAN. Does the Senator understand that in this case Commodore McDougal and the officers have claimed anything?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, Mr. President; I have not intimated any such thing. I do not. They have not. I should be surprised if they had. That brings me, having cleared up the question of right, to a question of exactly what is our duty, if duty can be said of gratitude, and I think it can. Often gratitude is a duty. What is our duty considering the general interest of the country, speaking of its interest in the best sense—not its interest in losing or saving $125,000, but in its best sense, considered in reference to the stimulus which every country ought to give to its enterprising and gallant citizens to distinguish themselves in time of public peril—how far we ought to go?

If we are to adopt the rule and hold it out to all our people that they are to expect whenever they go into an enterprise of public peril in the service of their country that they are to have some undefined and unknown sum of material compensation and reward beyond what the laws have fixed for them, if that is the policy, then this undoubtedly is a good instance to exercise it.

Mr. THURMAN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. By our treaties with Japan we have treated as piratical vessels those which were destroyed by the Wyoming. If instead of sinking the Lancefield Commodore McDougal had captured her and brought her into port and had her condemned in a prize-court, he and his crew would, under the law, have been entitled to prize-money. Now, inasmuch as we by our treaties have ascertained the fact that she is to be considered as a piratical vessel, does the Senator think that there is no equity in allowing the officers and crew of the Wyoming prize-money just as if she had been brought into port and condemned?

Mr. EDMUNDS. First let me answer the Senator's first question, which I had not fully yet. I had not disposed of the subject of public interest as connected with gratitude with the stimuli that are to be held out in an undefinable way in advance to all citizens of a country to uphold it in time of peril. I am one of those who think—it may be old-fashioned or new-fashioned, I do not know which—that every citizen of a country owes to it military and naval service just as much as he owes to it the payment of taxes.

Mr. THURMAN. Did the Senator, as I and most of us have done, ever contribute money to get his ward in his city out of the draft?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, Mr. President, I never did; neither did the city of which I happen to be an inhabitant. The city of which I happen to be an inhabitant contributed men.

Mr. THURMAN. Not money?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Money by taxation and men by volunteering, which I believe is a pretty good way to carry on a war myself, and I never heard, even obtained in that way, that they disgraced the State of Vermont or the city of Burlington.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say, if the Senator will allow me, that I honor them for it, for I am opposed to the whole principle of substitutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, Mr. President, we have got a good way from the seas we were discussing.

I repeat that I think the true principles, the broad principles of encouraging and stimulating activity and gallantry in the support of the rights of a country must not be made to rest in advance upon any expectation of pecuniary gain of the citizen who enters and performs that service except that which the law provides for it. All beyond that, in my judgment, is a matter of generosity, or rather a matter of gratitude, and if the occasion rises to that condition that makes it a signal instance, that calls for special and peculiar marks of the approbation, of the gratitude of the country, there is the case, as with Decatur, and as with Winslow of the Kearsarge, for this generosity and this gratitude. But I am bound to say, Mr. President—and I incline to believe that the gallant commodore who went up with the Wyoming and that gallant lieutenant who went up with the Takiang would agree with me—that there was nothing in the visit of those public ships of the United States, or of the allied powers, to the Straits of Simonoseki that exceeded the ordinary—the ordinary in its simplest sense—service due from a man-of-war. There was nothing so grand, so heroic, so historic, so peculiar in the warfare that these trained and civilized Anglo-Saxon men made upon these orientals in that little strait as to bring the case within the rule, if you put it upon the ground of gratitude and not upon a general principle that in all cases where there is a collision you are to pay something over. That is the way it appears to me. If I am wrong about that I shall be most cheerfully corrected by the Senate. If I am not wrong about it, then, unless we establish the principle that in all cases of collision property destroyed shall be equivalent to property captured, and therefore the parties are entitled to a share as if it had been captured and the real result of the property had been turned into the Treasury, which is a different thing, I do not see the propriety of the second section. I am content if you wish to establish such a rule, but I doubt its wisdom.

Now, my friend says on the ground of equity, leaving the question of generosity, if the ships that were sunk by the Wyoming in 1863 had been captured and brought into port and submitted to a prize-court and condemned, the officers and crew of the Wyoming would have been entitled to a certain share as prize-money. Granted. If not, why is it not just as equitable in this case, he asks. We might put a thousand cases. If Commodore McDougal had been a rear-admiral he would have received higher pay; but he was not a rear-admiral. The ships were not brought in, and therefore nothing was brought to the Treasury out of which a share could be given to these people. We make an exception and do give it to them, treating the destruction as more valuable than capture, as in the case of the Kearsarge. The grandeur of the instance of the Kearsarge would have been vastly diminished if, instead of fighting it out with great gallantry until the Alabama went to the bottom, aided and comforted by her English crew and her English compeers, she had quietly hauled down her colors and been brought to Boston. The affair would not have been half as grand and half as heroic as it was. I would much rather, we would all much rather in such a case, that the Alabama should have gone to the bottom where she fired her guns and in sight of that coast where she had been fitted out. That was where she belonged; and I should pay with delight double the money that we did give to those officers and crew, as in the place of the petty sum that could have been got for her on a sale when she was brought in and condemned by a prize-court. She finished the figure of history. Built and manned on English ground and sailing from English seas, she lies for aught I know within a marine league of the English shores—I hope she has washed over there by this time—at home where she belongs. I am glad she did not return to any prize-court. That is a case where generosity, where policy, where pride makes the gift to the officers and sailors take the place of a measure awarded by a prize-court. If this was such a case also, then let us give it to them by all means. If it was not, let us change the general law, and make a rule that everybody who comes into collision and destroys any property of an enemy on the sea shall have a share as if he had turned it into the Treasury.

Mr. President, as the Senator from Ohio has suggested that these two questions may be different, as they are, I will withdraw the motion to postpone indefinitely. I do not wish to embarrass any action about the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to postpone is withdrawn.

Mr. THURMAN. I have only a single remark to make, which I am very sure I would not have to make if the Senator from Vermont had looked carefully into the precedents. The Senator from Vermont draws a distinction between the engagement of the Kearsarge and the Alabama and the engagement between the Wyoming and the Japanese batteries and ships. He speaks of the engagement in which Commodore McDougal was so conspicuous as an ordinary service of our naval force. What is meant by that I do not know, except that the ordinary service of the American Navy has always been to uphold its flag and the honor of its country. But if he were really to draw a true comparison between the personal heroism and bravery of the commander of the Kearsarge and the commander of the Wyoming, I have no fears that my old schoolmate and friend, McDougal, would suffer by the comparison.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly he would not.

Mr. THURMAN. The Kearsarge was a ship as large and as fully equipped as the Alabama, and if my memory is correct they never were nearer than one-half mile to each other. I say this not to detract from the merit of the commander of the Kearsarge. He deserves all the honor that has been awarded him and more, and he and his officers and crew have received the grateful acknowledgments of the nation in the award to him and them of the full value of the Alabama. But McDougal, with his Wyoming, with his six guns only, fought at pistol-shot distance the shore batteries and the ships of Japan with one hundred and thirty-two guns. He, with six guns and one hundred and sixty men, at pistol-shot distance, fought those shore batteries and ships of war with over one hundred and thirty guns and thirteen hundred men, so that the officers of the Navy to this day speak of it as "Dave McDougal running a muck." That is the fact about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out in section 1, commencing in line 6, the words "if not incompatible with the relations of the United States to other powers."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not think there is any objection to the adoption of that amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was in hopes that my friend from New Jersey would oppose the adoption of that amendment if the bill is to pass. It seems to me that as this money has been divided, if we have a right to do anything about it at all, as I admit we have, it does not depend upon anybody's will but our own. Of course all there can be about it in respect to foreign powers would be the moral effect. If we pass this bill it might be said that the foreign powers would feel hurt——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I said that I was in favor of the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I am saying that I am opposed to it, because I think it unwise to pass an act of Congress to pay back money, which, if we pass it, we shall have decided belongs of right to the Empire of Japan, depending upon the will of any foreign government. Even if it does disturb our relations with a foreign power, if this money belongs to Japan, let us pay it to her.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. As I understood the amendment, it was to strike out that part of the bill which proposes that we should take into consideration the views of foreign governments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Ah, if it is to strike that out, I am for it. I thought it was an amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut to insert such a clause.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No, it is to strike it out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is quite right; I withdraw my speech. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I move to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, the evening is far spent, and I confess that I do not feel prepared to vote on this bill. I had about made up my mind to vote for it until I heard the exposition of the treaties and the circumstances under which they are made by the Senator from Vermont; and what he has said has impressed me very much. His speech certainly contains a great deal of information as to the history of this transaction that does not appear in the report of the committee.

The Senator from New Jersey made a very full and, I thought at the time, thorough exposition of the matter, taken in connection with the report of the committee, and I felt very clear in my conviction as to my course of duty; but I confess that now I begin to see the matter in a little different light. I for one would like to have further time to consider the matter. If this money is justly ours—and according to his exposition it would seem to be so—I do not want to return a dollar of it; but, on the other hand, if, as claimed by other Senators and by the committee, it is due to Japan, I would scorn myself and despise my country if we kept a dollar of it.

I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have this matter disposed of tonight or let it be postponed to a later period, so that we can go on with other business. We shall be crowded off in a day or two. The Senate is aware that this has crowded off a bill upon which there ought to be action by the Senate. The Senate is pretty full now. We might as well vote upon this question. It has been very ably discussed.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator from North Carolina allow me to suggest that there is a serious difference of opinion as to whether any of this money ought to be returned to Japan, and the opposition to returning any part of it has been greatly strengthened by the very able argument of the Senator from Vermont. Now those who are opposed to returning any part of this money, or think it doubtful whether we ought to do so, can achieve their purpose by moving to strike out the first section of the bill.

I have said already that in my judgment we had received all the indemnity we were entitled to and more, and that after having repaid ourselves all which we were fairly entitled to, it would be the sublimest act in history, one for which I confess I know no example, for us to return the money to Japan. I may be entirely mistaken about that. Perhaps it was rather sentimental in me than otherwise to say so, and therefore I do not press it; but let the vote be taken on the motion of the Senator from California to strike out the first section. If that carries, then let us perfect the second section, for it needs one or two amendments, and then vote on the bill, and I think we can vote on it and determine it this afternoon.

Mr. MERRIMON. That does not meet my difficulty. I confess I should like to hear more on this subject, and to have an opportunity to examine it myself. I have been going by the report of the committee. I concur most heartily in the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] taking his premises to be true; but, according to the speech of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] his premises are not true. Now, which am I to believe? I wish to exercise my judgment. One or the other is mistaken. I want to be informed.

The Senator from Ohio who sits nearest me [Mr. SHERMAN] suggests that we dispose of this bill by postponing it until an indefinite period in the future if we do not dispose of it now. Why, sir, there is a very large sum of money involved in this bill, and possibly—I do not know how that fact is—my vote may determine how it shall go. Perhaps the votes of two or three Senators will determine how it shall go. It seems to me there ought to be a fair opportunity, where a request is made in such sincerity, to have all the information we can get upon it. The sum is too large to be disposed of in a very hurried way, and the question is too serious a one, affecting international rights, international duties, international honor.

I now renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope that motion may prevail. I think we ought to have further time to examine this very grave question.

TRANSFER OF AN APPROPRIATION.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Before the Senate goes into executive session I want to ask the indulgence of the Senate to have the House bill that lies on the table laid before the Senate with a view to its reference.

The bill (H. R. No. 3356) authorizing a transfer of a certain appropriation was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think on reflection I will ask that that lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from North Carolina will consent, I will move that the Senate now take up what is called the silver bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us stick to one thing; otherwise we shall get everything huddled up.

Mr. MERRIMON. I only want an opportunity to examine this matter further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. MERRIMON. I insist upon my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina declines to yield. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 31, noes 12.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at four o'clock and fifty-seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 2, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair begs leave to lay before the House certain executive communications which were not submitted yesterday owing to the suddenness of the adjournment.

CAMP AND GARRISON EQUIPAGE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting letters of the Quartermaster-General relative to House resolution No. 102, regarding expenditures for camp and garrison equipage; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A. B. STEINBERGER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, in answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of 15th March last, a report from the Secretary of State and accompanying papers.

U. S. GRANT.

WASHINGTON, May 1, 1876.

The message and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

OPENING OF CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the information of Congress, the report of the president of the Centennial Commission upon the ceremonies to be observed at the opening of the exposition, on the 10th instant. It will be observed that an invitation is therein extended to Senators and Representatives to be present on that occasion.

U. S. GRANT.

WASHINGTON, May 1, 1876.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire that the invitation may be read.

Mr. HOPKINS. I was about to make that motion, if I had been able to catch the Speaker's eye.

Mr. RANDALL. It is quite long. It is in all the papers.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I would like to hear it read.

Mr. RANDALL. You can read it in the RECORD. I ask that it may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There was no objection.

The message and accompanying report were ordered to be entered on the Journal, and referred to the Select Committee on the Centennial Exposition. The report is as follows:

THE UNITED STATES CENTENNIAL COMMISSION,
INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION OF 1876,
Philadelphia, April 20, 1876.

SIR: In obedience to the law constituting this organization, I have the honor to submit, in behalf of the commission, a schedule of the ceremonies to be observed at the opening of the International Exhibition of 1876, on the 10th proximo.

Formal invitations to attend have been sent to the President of the United States, the Cabinet, the Supreme Court, the diplomatic corps, the Congress, the Government centennial board, the foreign commissioners to the exhibition, the governors of the States and Territories and their staffs, the Legislature of Pennsylvania, the city authorities of Philadelphia, the chief officers of the Army and Navy, the women's national centennial committee, the centennial board of finance, and others in official positions or officially connected with the work of the exhibition.

On the morning of May 10 the grounds and buildings in general will be open to the public at 9 a. m. The memorial hall, or art gallery, the main building, and the machinery hall will be reserved to the invited guests and the exhibitors until the close of the ceremonies, about noon, when all restrictions will be removed. The exercises will take place in the open air, upon the south terrace of memorial hall, fronting the main building, in full view of the general public.

Invited guests, unless notified to the contrary, will enter the main building by way of the carriage concourse at the east end of that building, or by the south, middle, or western doors thereof. These entrances will be open to them at 9 a. m.

The music will be under the direction of Theodore Thomas, assisted by Dudley Buck, with an orchestra of one hundred and fifty and a chorus of eight hundred.

It is expected that guests will be seated in the amphitheater prepared on the south front of memorial hall by 10.15 a. m. The orchestra will play the national airs of all countries represented at the exhibition.

The President of the United States will be escorted to the grounds by Governor Hartranft, of Pennsylvania, and a division or more of troops from Pennsylvania and New Jersey arriving about 10.30 a. m.

PROGRAMME.

1. Centennial Inauguration March, by Richard Wagner, of Germany.
2. Prayer by Right Rev. Bishop Simpson.
3. Hymn by John G. Whittier; music by John K. Paine, of Massachusetts; orchestral and organ accompaniment.
4. Cantata, the words by Sidney Lanier, of Georgia; music by Dudley Buck, of Connecticut; orchestral and organ accompaniment.
5. Presentation of the exhibition by the president of the Centennial Commission.
6. Address by the President of the United States.

The declaration that the exhibition is open will be followed by the raising of flags, salutes of artillery, the ringing of the chimes, and Handel's Hallelujah Chorus, with organ and orchestral accompaniment.

The foreign commissioners will pass into the main building and take places opposite their respective sections. The President of the United States and the guests of the day will pass through the main building. The foreign commissioners, upon the President's passing them, will join the procession, and the whole body will cross to machinery hall. There, at the proper moment, the President will set in motion the great engine and all the machinery connected therewith. A brief reception by the President of the United States in the judges' pavillion will close the formal observances of the day.

The Centennial Commission is happy to report that the buildings and grounds, so far as the commission and board of finance are directly responsible, will be quite completely ready on the appointed day. The exhibits from foreign countries are extensive and brilliant beyond our anticipations. It would be too much to expect that every exhibitor should have his space in perfect order at the opening, though the most strenuous efforts to that end will be continually made; but the commission ventures to think that no previous exhibition was so far advanced at the same relative day.

The commission begs leave to ask the President to communicate this report to Congress soon, and most respectfully invites both Houses to attend the opening ceremonies of the international exhibition held in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the Declaration of our national Independence.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOS. R. HAWLEY,
President Centennial Commission.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

EXHIBITION OF LIFE-SAVING STATION-HOUSE.

Mr. FOSTER, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 110) authorizing the exhibition of a life-saving station-house at the centennial exposition; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask that the joint resolution may be put upon its passage.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to place on exhibition at the centennial exposition, upon such ground as may be alotted for the purpose, one of the life-saving station-houses authorized to be constructed on the coast of the United States by existing law, and for which appropriation has already been made, and to cause the same to be completely equipped with all the apparatus, furniture, and appliances now in use at the respective life-saving stations of the United States, said building and apparatus to be removed after the close of the exposition and re-erected and used for a life-saving station at the place now authorized by law; provided, however, that such exhibition of said station-house and equipment thereof and the return thereof shall not be attended with any expense to the United States beyond appropriations heretofore made in aid of said exhibition from the several Departments of the Government.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FOSTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WORKS UNDER GRANT TO JAMES B. EADS.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to send to this House a copy of any report made to him of the official inspection of works going on under the grant of Congress to James B. Eads made since November, 1875.

ELEVATOR IN SOUTH WING OF CAPITOL.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH also, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be, and they are, requested to inquire into the feasibility, expediency, and expense of putting a suitable elevator into the south wing of this Capitol.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR LIGHT-HOUSE SERVICE.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3356) authorizing the transfer of a certain appropriation; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. Of the sum of $585,000 appropriated in the first section of the act of March 3, 1875, making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, for salaries of nine hundred and twenty-five light-house keepers and light-beacon keepers and their assistants, the bill authorizes the sum of $16,000 to be transferred to and used in aid of the appropriation made in the same act for the maintenance of lights on the Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri Rivers, and such buoys as may be necessary, including salaries of keepers.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. The appropriation for the maintenance of lights on the Ohio, Missouri, and Mississippi Rivers is exhausted. The appropriation for lights on the coast is in excess of the amount necessary to 1st of July. This bill simply transfers $16,000 from one appropriation to the other, in order to keep up the lights on those rivers. It is very important that the bill should pass at once. Unless this appropriation is made the lights will go out this week.

Mr. CONGER. Would it not be better to make a direct appropriation for this purpose instead of transferring an appropriation from one purpose to another?

Mr. HOLMAN. O, no!

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I have a letter in my hand from the secretary of the Light-House Board showing that there is a surplus of $35,000 or $40,000 in one fund, while another fund is short. By making a transfer from one fund to another it will not be necessary to call for a new appropriation. I call the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. Is that out of the appropriation for this year or for next year?

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. It is out of the appropriation for this year.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to what I believe is a privileged motion. But if gentlemen desire to offer any matters that are pressing, I will yield for a few moments.

EXECUTORS OF REAR-ADMIRAL LAVALETTE.

Mr. O'NEILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3357) for the relief of Mary and Albert T. Lavalette, executors of the estate of Rear-Admiral Elie A. F. Lavalette; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

HALLET KILBOURN.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the real-estate pool be directed to accept the offer of Hallet Kilbourn to appear before that committee to answer any inquiries relating to such real-estate pool and to furnish such information to said committee as the books in his possession may contain, and the said committee are directed to examine said Hallet Kilbourn and his books.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that that resolution be laid on the table; that is the right way to treat it.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. I did not yield the floor for the purpose of the introduction of anything for action. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WELLS] did not certainly understand that I yielded the floor when about to make a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the appropriation bill, to allow him to have the yeas and nays on a proposition like this.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. The point of order certainly comes too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana did not make his objection in time.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi certainly understood that I yielded the floor simply for the introduction of measures for reference, and not for action.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I understood that I had the floor to offer the resolution. I did offer it; and a motion has been made to lay it on the table, and on that question the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. The right way to treat it is to treat it with contempt.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the call of the roll.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I want to make an inquiry of the Chair. Can this resolution come before this body without unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood that unanimous consent was given, because no one objected when he put the question, and the Chair put the question distinctly to the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] objected. I heard him.

Mr. HOLMAN. I tried to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not hear the gentleman, although he was waiting for objections.

The question was taken on Mr. RANDALL'S motion; and there were—yeas 138, nays 84, not voting 68; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashe, Atkins, John H. Bagley, jr., Banning, Barnum, Bell, Blackburn, Bland, Blount, Bradford, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Candler, Cate, Caulfield, Chapin, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Clymer, Cochrane, Collins, Cook, Cowan, Culberson, Cutler, Davis, De Bolt, Dibrell, Douglas, Durham, Eden, Egbert, Ellis, Ely, Faulkner, Felton, Finley, Forney, Franklin, Fuller, Gause, Gibson, Goode, Goodin, Gunter, Andrew H. Williams, Willis, Benjamin Wilson, and Woodburn—68.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. DIBRELL said: My colleague, Mr. BRIGHT, is confined to his room by sickness.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will now yield to my colleague, [Mr. LANDERS,] who desires to offer a resolution, and then I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TARBOX] with the understanding that neither proposition will occupy any time, but if it be necessary that there shall be a vote taken upon them I must decline to yield.

UNITED STATES COINS, ETC.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to consider the state of gold and silver coins, domestic and foreign, and to report such amendment to the existing laws concerning coins as may be deemed expedient; and to investigate the best means of restoring coins to circulation on an equality with each other; and also as to the best means of making coins and United States notes, known as "greenbacks," par with each other; and further, how to substitute coins from time to time for the lower denominations of United States notes, without selling interest-bearing bonds of the Federal Government to purchase coin for that purpose; and that said committee shall have leave to report by bill or otherwise at any time.

Mr. KELLEY. I object.

LITTLE ROCK AND FORT SMITH RAILROAD BONDS.

Mr. TARBOX. I ask unanimous consent to submit for adoption at this time the preamble and resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is publicly alleged, and is not denied by the officers of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, that that corporation did, in the year 1871 or 1872, become the owner of certain bonds of the Little Rock and Fort Smith Railroad Company, for which bonds the said Union Pacific Railroad Company paid a consideration largely in excess of their actual or market value, and that the board of directors of said Union Pacific Railroad Company, though urged, have neglected to investigate said transaction: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire if any such transaction took place, and, if so, what were the circumstances and inducements thereto, from what person or persons said bonds were obtained and upon what consideration, and whether the transaction was from corrupt design or in furtherance of any corrupt object; and that the committee have power to send for persons and papers.

There being no objection, the preamble and resolution were adopted.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the annual Post-Office appropriation bill. Before submitting that motion——

Mr. POPPLETON. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. POPPLETON. My point of order is that the House should now proceed to the consideration of the contested-election case of Le Moyne vs. Farwell, from the third congressional district of the State of Illinois; that that subject takes precedence of the subject embraced in the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] both on the ground that it is a question of highest privilege, and also that it is the unfinished business coming over from Saturday last.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose that the question of consideration may fairly be raised upon the motion which I make to go into Committee of the Whole on the Post-Office appropriation bill. If that motion shall be voted down, then the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POPPLETON] will be in order. The Post-Office appropriation bill was made the special order in Committee of the Whole for to-day immediately after the reading of the Journal, and from day to day until disposed of.

Before my motion is submitted to the House, I desire to ask unanimous consent for a night session. Inasmuch as a number of gentlemen wish to be heard in general debate upon this appropriation bill, and inasmuch as it is quite obvious that no very considerable amount of time can be consumed in such general debate, I ask unanimous consent that the House now order a recess from half past four until half past seven to-day, for general debate in Committee of the Whole on the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will be bound first to decide the point of order raised by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. POPPLETON.] Under the rule the Chair decides that contested-election cases are of the highest privilege. This particular case in question is also unfinished business under Rule 56, coming from Saturday last; and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POPPLETON] is entitled to the floor to make his motion to proceed with the consideration of the contested-election case.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I raise the question of consideration upon that motion, for I think it is of the highest importance that the appropriation bill should be disposed of as early as possible.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If this question is debatable, I desire to say that I trust the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will not insist upon raising the question of consideration upon this case. This is the second time that it is proposed to defer this contested-election case for an appropriation bill. It is a question of the highest privilege, involving the right of a member to a seat and vote in this House. This case has already gone over once for an appropriation bill which has since been completed. We then had the solemn promise of the Committee on Appropriations that this case should be brought before the House and disposed of as soon as the legislative appropriation bill was passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have heard of no such promise.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] made that statement upon the floor and the RECORD will bear me out. We accepted his statement, and now claim the fulfillment of the promise.

Mr. HOLMAN. The contested-election case could have been considered on yesterday very well, I suppose, if the House had been disposed to consider it then. I insist upon raising the question of consideration upon the grounds I have indicated, as I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations so to do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first question to be submitted to the House is, will the House now proceed with the consideration of the contested-election case of Le Moyne vs. Farwell, from the third congressional district of the State of Illinois?

The question was taken; and the motion of Mr. POPPLETON was agreed to.

ELECTION CONTEST—LE MOYNE VS. FARWELL.

The House accordingly resumed the consideration of the contested-election case of Le Moyne vs. Farwell, from the third congressional district of Illinois.

The resolutions of the majority of the Committee of Elections were as follows:

Resolved, That Charles B. Farwell was not elected, and is not entitled, to a seat in this House as a member of the Forty-fourth Congress from the third congressional district of Illinois.

Resolved, That John V. Le Moyne was elected, and is entitled, to a seat in this House as a member of the Forty-fourth Congress from the third congressional district of Illinois.

The resolutions of the minority of the commitee were as follows:

Resolved, That John V. Le Moyne was not elected, and is not entitled, to a seat in this House from the third congressional district of Illinois.

Resolved, That Charles B Farwell was elected, and is entitled, to a seat in this House from the third congressional district of Illinois.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SAYLER.) The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POPPLETON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. POPPLETON. Mr. Speaker, in what I shall have to say in the further consideration of the case from the third congressional district of the State of Illinois I shall confine myself mainly to the discussion of the question of the disposition to be made of the vote of the first precinct of the twentieth ward in the city of Chicago. Thus far in this discussion much has been said as to the manner in which this House should dispose of that precinct in determining which of the two persons contending for this seat should have it. The returned majority for the sitting member being 186 in the entire district, the fraudulent votes proved, if rejected, would change the result in favor of contestee. It seems to me that this question has been measurably decided by the contestant and contestee in the presentation of the issue surrounding that ward. The gentlemen most deeply interested personally in this contest understood best, it is fair to presume, the issue that they were to present for the consideration of this House. In order that the House might intelligently pass upon the questions involved they presented their issue; and that issue, so far as this precinct is concerned, was embodied in the second assignment of the notice and answered in the second assignment of reasons given by the answer. To these I desire to call the attention of the House. I first read from the notice:

Second. That a large number of persons, to wit, more than five hundred, were permitted to vote for you at the following election precincts in said districts, namely, the first, second, third, and fourth precincts of the sixteenth ward of the city of Chicago; the third precinct of the eighteenth ward of the city of Chicago; the first precinct of the nineteenth ward of the city of Chicago; and the first, second, third, and fifth precincts of the twentieth ward of the city of Chicago, who had no legal right to vote thereat.

That is the allegation of the contestant. It is answered upon the part of the contestee in this wise:

I deny that any person or persons were permitted to vote for me at the following election precincts or at either of them in said district.

Giving all the precincts charged in the second specification of the notice, and emphatically the first precinct of the twentieth ward of the city of Chicago.

This is the issue joined between these parties. When the issue thus joined is presented they proceed to take the testimony necessary to determine the question as to the number of illegal votes that were polled; and what is the result? Upon this issue Mr. Le Moyne, the contestant, produces his witnesses, and the result is that he shows 252 illegal, fraudulent, and unauthorized votes as having been polled for the contestee at that precinct. The proof makes that out clearly and conclusively; there is no question about it. There has been no attempt in the committee-room, by counsel or otherwise, to deny the stubborn fact that there is overwhelming proof in this case that 252 votes were cast for Mr. Farwell at the first precinct, twentieth ward, city of Chicago. The whole question was tried upon that proposition. During the whole examination of the case no person attempted to present any other issue save and except the question as to the number of illegal votes that were polled and for whom they were polled. When the fact was demonstrated that a greater number of votes had been polled for Mr. Farwell than his majority, illegally polled, fraudulently polled, then for the first time in the history of this case have we presented for our consideration the proposition to exclude the entire poll. Why? I desire the House to understand why. For the reason that Mr. Farwell's returned majority in the first precinct of the twentieth ward of Chicago is 171. Mr. Le Moyne, the contestant, has proved by sworn testimony that Mr. Farwell received 252 illegal votes. Why is this proposition now made to exclude that precinct so that these parties will be sent out of that precinct even? For the simple reason that by these means and through the practical workings of that exclusion Mr. Farwell will receive the benefit of 81 illegal votes. That is the reason this proposition is made to the committee and to this House. After the case has been submitted to the committee, after it has undergone consideration at the hands of the subcommittee, after the proof has been closed, after the argument has been made, after everything that could be said has been said for and against the sitting member and the contestant, after all this a supplemental brief is presented by the counsel for the sitting member, and placed upon the desk of members of the committee. Then for the first time do they learn the fact that this issue is raised, that the proposition is to exclude this entire poll.

I desire the House to understand exactly how this case is presented; and in order that it may be understood I wish to call attention to the claim of the contestee before the committee in the examination of this case.

On the fifth page of his brief you will find the following:

Now, while we are of opinion that, under the law, the contestant has utterly failed to establish his case, we are willing that this election should be decided upon the showing made by himself and by his testimony as corrected by the records before the committee; and we are willing that the canvass of the votes should be made here and now in this room and before this committee. The papers in the case furnish the means for making such canvass; and if we are not supported in our claims by that canvass, we are perfectly willing, if the committee so decide, to have the case sent back to the people for a new election. But, while we do not admit the correctness of the contestant's statements, we propose to show that by the figures of his brief, as corrected by the record, a sufficient majority will be shown for the contestee. We are willing to abide by the figures and the facts.

That is the issue upon which this case was heard and tried before the committee. As I have said, never until after the evidence had been closed, the arguments made, and the case submitted to the committee was a supplemental brief placed upon the desks of members raising for the first time an issue that had never been raised in the whole trial of the cause before the committee. After the submission of the case, all parties acquiescing in the proposition that there should be a canvass of the votes made, the case proceeding upon the issue that I have read, the issue presented by the second paragraph of the notice and denied by the second paragraph of the answer of the contestee, the proposition to exclude the entire poll is made. As I said, the reason of this change of front is perfectly apparent; the reason for changing the issue thus joined between the parties is entirely plain. When it became perfectly apparent that this poll had been conducted by the riffraff, by the inhabitants of the sinks of iniquity in the low sands of the city of Chicago in the interest of the sitting member—when it became perfectly apparent that there could be no integrity attached to the returns of these parties—when it became perfectly apparent that each and every member of the committee, democrat or republican, must at once renounce the acts of this board thus constituted in the interest of the sitting member, then for the first time the proposition is made to exclude this poll.

And there is only one reason for making that proposition. By the exclusion of the poll the sitting member would be benefited to the extent of 81 votes. In other words, he would receive 81 fraudulent votes. That was the attempted act on the part of this board of rascals and scoundrels, as the committee each and all admit them to have been proved; that they had carried the fraud to the fullest extent that they were capable of executing it. Then the sitting member turns to the House and says, "I ask you to consummate the fraud, not only by excluding the vote Le Moyne received at this poll, but to count the 81 fraudulent votes I received."

In order that the House may know something of the character of the men upon whom the sitting member and his friends rely, who are the friends of the party and the sitting member, I desire the House shall know a little something of the character of these persons from the testimony, who these men were and what kind of men they were. Mr. Hesing, a reputable gentleman of the city of Chicago, hearing that this misconduct was being had on the part of those who were for Farwell in the first precinct of the twentieth ward, went there to have the abuse corrected. I now read from his testimony:

As I arrived at the precinct, I met a person who had been designated as challenger. We immediately were surrounded by a mob, shoulder-bruisers, penitentiary-birds, and gamblers. I attempted to make the ascent of this inclined plane for the purpose of talking to the judges about admitting this challenger and was pushed by several persons, and when I got half way up the inclined plane a man by the name of Burns, who but a short time previous had been released from the penitentiary, pushed me from this plane. The crowd then set upon me and said, "Hesing, you can't run this precinct as you run the convention, you God-damn son of a bitch! Go to your own precinct." I called upon the police to interfere, asking them if they wouldn't defend me. They took no steps, but simply said, "We don't meddle in politics." I made the ascent again after being pulled and hauled by this crowd, and succeeded in getting on to the platform. There was nobody either on the inclined plane or the platform when I began the ascent the second time. Before I got to the platform this same man Burns gave or made one jump on to the platform, gave me a push against the wall, and got to this opening in the window before I did, put his head through the opening, and kept up a conversation with the judges. I tried to speak to the judges, motioned to them, rapped on the window, but no attention was paid by the judges. I stood there fully ten minutes. All this while Burns kept pushing me and the crowd below was hooting and using all sorts of threats. They then began to pull my breeches to pull me off the platform. I again appealed to the police (there were three officers and a sergeant below) to protect me. The answer again was, "We don't meddle in politics." The crowd kept on jeering and hooting and pulling, while Burns was pushing me. Burns did not vote while standing there. The crowd called upon the police to remove me from that platform, stating I had no right there. I never spoke back a word to anybody in the crowd. Threats were then hallooed out by the crowd against the police that they must do their duty to remove me from the platform. Policeman No. 512 pulled out his club and said, "Hesing, get down from there." Burns gave me a push, the policeman swung his club, grabbed me by the leg of my pants, and pulled me down from the platform. I again appealed to the police a third time, as my life was in danger, to defend me. The crowd surrounded me, hustled me off, and the police replied, "We don't meddle in politics." I remained perfectly cool, didn't say a word to anybody, and Mr. Michael Corcoran, brother of the candidate for alderman, and who has twice been in the penitentiary, stepped up to me, shook his fist for at least two minutes within a half an inch of my nose, and said, "Hesing, you God-damn son of a bitch, you had better go home; you can't do anything here!"

Another man, who by the way was a school-mate of mine, Tim Casey, used similar words. I then appealed to Sergeant Gerding to protect me, who saw this whole transaction. He simply replied, "It's all right; you had better go home." I tried again to get to the judges, but in vain, as threats were used, and I heard voices exclaiming, "Push him off! Kill him! Don't let him up!" &c. I appealed once more to the police, with the law about admitting a challenger in my hand, and showed them that a challenger must be admitted. The crowd again gathered around us, and I heard voices exclaiming, "We won't admit a challenger here; you can't get one in;" and when I told them the law said there must be a challenger, the reply was, "We don't care a damn for the law, because we are not going to allow a challenger; we are going to run this precinct." I waited around there a few minutes, and seeing that all attempts to get to the judges or have a hearing from anybody, or even have my life protected, as several missiles had already been thrown, were in vain, I departed.

Q. Was there any challenger on behalf of the party of which contestant was the nominee at said precinct on said day at any time subsequent to the time referred to in the last answer; if not, why not?

A. No, sir; there was no challenger. The judges would not admit one, and the crowd interposed its objection. The challenger was there at eight o'clock; the polls were opened at ten minutes before eight. The crowd and the judges said that as the challenger was not on time they had no right to admit him afterward.

Q. Who was the chief of police for the city of Chicago at the time of said election?

A. Jacob Rehm.

Q. Did he take any part in the campaign preceding and at said election; if so, on whose behalf, and was he active or otherwise?

A. He did take an active part preceding and at the election. He in fact ran the campaign for Mr. C. B. Farwell.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the class of persons, these are the kind of men who were called upon there, and whom you are now asked to consider. These men were got together in the interest of the sitting member, and now he asks you by a proposition for the exclusion of this poll to count for him 81 votes which are proved to have been fraudulently cast and illegal. Any gentleman need only to run over the proof in this volume of testimony which we have in the case and he will find recorded the proof classified of these votes, which in the aggregate amount to 252. You will find they were votes of persons residing out of the precinct, voters from vacant lots where numbers were given for houses on lots where there were no houses. You will find a large number of repeaters giving fictitious residences, taking the names of men who were dead, taking imaginary names. And this testimony is uncontradicted, undeniable, and undenied, so far as the finding of the committee is concerned. You will also find changed ballots, non-resident voters of other classes than those enumerated in these tables. All this you will find in the proof, and all are classified in this way.

Now, in order that you may understand how the committee were able to determine this, I desire to call your attention to one of the features of the law of the State of Illinois. It is this: It requires the name of the voter shall be given on the roll, his residence, and the number of his place of residence. His name is set opposite a certain number upon the poll-book, and a corresponding number is placed upon his ballot. All that it is necessary to do is to refer to the poll-book and refer to the ballot, and you can ascertain for whom he voted, whether for Mr. Le Moyne or Mr. Farwell. You ascertain he was a non-resident by having given a fictitious residence. You ascertain he gave a fictitious residence from the fact there was no house on the lot where he said he had his residence. You will find each one of these ballots accredited to Mr. Farwell—252 of them. Besides, by the duplicity and double-dealing of this board you will find there is an entire absence of some 84 ballots of persons who did vote—I believe the number is exactly 84.

I desire the House to mark one fact, that throughout the entire canvass, from beginning to end, from first to last, there is not a scintilla of proof going to show that Mr. Le Moyne received a single fraudulent vote—not one fraudulent vote. There was nobody there stealing for him. They were there stealing from him, but there was nobody there stealing in his interest. No witness called in the case has attempted either by insinuation or directly to say that Mr. Le Moyne received a single fraudulent vote at this poll.

What necessarily follows? If the issue is joined the question then becomes important, Who received these fraudulent votes, and how many did they receive? The proof is that Mr. Le Moyne received no fraudulent ballots and that Mr. Farwell received 252. Who shall receive the benefit, the party whose friends perpetrated the fraud, or the innocent party—the man whose hands are not sullied with fraud in any shape or form in the conduct of the poll? It seems to me the argument is conclusive that these ballots must be charged up and against Mr. Farwell.

The process of purging these polls is easy, perfectly easy, and perfectly to be understood. When you find the ballot of a non-resident you know exactly for whom he voted. Charge up that ballot to the man for whom he thus fraudulently voted, and you readily ascertain the number of fraudulent ballots cast for each party.

In this case, Mr. Speaker, the contestee comes before the House with a virtual admission of fraud. One of the principal charges of the contestant was that a large number of fraudulent votes were polled for contestee in the first precinct of the twentieth ward in the city of Chicago; this was denied by contestee. But these frauds are so plainly proved that the committee have agreed unanimously that the returns cannot stand, that they are invalidated by reason of fraud. The contestee denying all fraud, the proof was made, showing a fraudulent registry, denial of challengers, &c., and all these frauds committed on behalf of contestee. When the contestant had proved a larger number of fraudulent votes for contestee than his whole majority in the precinct, then for the first time it is proposed, on behalf of the contestee—in whose behalf these frauds were committed—that by reason of these frauds the whole poll shall be rejected. It is true that if these frauds were not shown to be wholly by contestee, this suggestion might be proper, but it would be grossly inequitable and unfair to thus allow contestee to take advantage of his own wrong, and the legal maxim should be applied, "Nullus commodum capere potest de injuria sua propria." In Broom's Maxims this principle is stated most broadly, "A wrongful or fraudulent act shall not be allowed to conduce to the advantage of the party who committed it." It may be true that by reason of the fraudulent management of the ballot-box it may be more difficult to purge the poll, but if either party is to suffer by reason of such manipulation, by reason of such uncertainty, it should be the guilty, not the innocent, party. Suppose these ballots were personal property owned by two persons, one mixes them, and it thereby becomes impossible to distinguish the property of each, the innocent party takes the whole.

If articles of unequal value are mixed together producing an article of a different value from that of either separately, and through the fault of the person mixing them the other party cannot tell what was the original value of his property, he must have the whole. "At law," remarks Lord Redesdale, in Bard vs. Hopkins, "fraud destroys all rights; if I mix my corn with another's, he takes all." (Luptin vs. White, 15 Vesey, page 442; Blackstone's Commentaries, page 405; Colwell vs. Reeves, 2 Campbell's Nisi Prius, page 575; Story on Bailments, §§ 44-47.)

This is a principle so well settled and so ancient as to forbid discussion. In this case the sole difficulty which can be suggested arises from the fraudulent tampering with the ballots. The method of conducting the election—giving on the poll-book the residence and name of each voter and the number of his ballot with a corresponding number on the ballot itself—made it as easy and certain as possible to purge the poll, and when the non-residence or non-existence of any voter was established the ballot of such person could at once be identified and charged to the proper party, and if any element of uncertainty has been introduced by contestee, or his agents, your committee, or the House, or any court would only be following the fundamental legal principle in charging to contestee every illegal or doubtful vote. All doubts which arise from the wrongful numbering of the ballots are to be solved in favor of contestant, not on account of any party bias, but in conformity to a rule of law which any court would be obliged to follow. It is a fair presumption that the judges, clerks, and other persons at this precinct who were cheating for contestee did not hesitate to put wrong numbers on some of the ballots for contestant; they were certainly not putting in fraudulent votes for him.

This accounts for the fact that duplicate numbers appear for some of the ballots.

Second. Contestee makes a gain of 81 votes by having the polls rejected. Contestant has proved 252 illegal votes cast for contestee at this poll; his majority as returned was 171; now if he could succeed in having the entire poll thrown out he would be advantaged to the extent of the difference between his majority of 171 and 252, the number of fraudulent votes proved. Is it therefore at all surprising that this desperate effort is being made on the part of the sitting member to induce this House to accept his theory of the case and consummate the work conceived and begun by the villains whose habitations are in the sinks of iniquity, who spend their lives in the pit-falls of crime, whose only home is the disreputable "Hatch house," and who at all times hold themselves ready to embark in any undertaking that has for its object and aim the striking down of honesty, integrity, and fair dealing? This is the feast to which we are invited; this is the job the House is asked to finish, acting in its constitutional capacity in judging of the election and qualification of its own members.

No claim is made that contestant received a single fraudulent vote at this poll. Then it must be admitted that every vote credited to him was actually and in good faith on the part of the voter cast for him. The judges of the election stole from him, but did not steal for him. The number left at the close of the day and counted for Le Moyne was but a remnant of his honest vote. These rascally election officers had robbed him of a large percentage of the votes polled for him during the day, and it may well be said that the wonder is that they did not strip him entirely; but he had 251 votes left. These votes were so sacred, so just, that even these desperate, unscrupulous villains, clothed with official position on that election board, dare not lay their iniquitous hands upon them, but it is reserved for this House, according to the arguments of gentlemen advocating the cause of contestee, in the exercise of its high prerogative, to strike down the last vestige of honesty connected with this poll, and finish the work of disfranchisement by this villainous election board so auspiciously begun. Reject the entire poll, and we have gotten rid of each and all of the honest votes cast for contestant, that a disreputable election board had not the hardihood to rob him of in the hours of their dark and detestable crime.

I now call the attention of the House to the testimony of Chaplin, page 293; of O'Brien, page 248; of Blakely, page 253; and of Gerbing, page 269; persons who heard the vote announced at the close of the poll on the night of election. By their testimony it is proved that Le Moyne had 251 votes in that box still remaining there. After all the stealing during the day there was still this number of votes. Now it may be said, and it was argued, that this testimony also proves 422 votes for Farwell. So it does. But 252 of them have been shown by overwhelming proof to have been illegal. These must be deducted from the 422, leaving Farwell but 170 votes in all, against Le Moyne's 251; making a majority for Le Moyne of 81 in that election precinct. But Mr. Farwell says, "That kind of figuring won't do; I want to throw out the whole poll." Why does he want to do this? For the sole reason that 252 illegal and fraudulent votes have been proven for him. If there were no illegal votes established by proof, he would be the last man to ask for the rejection of the entire poll; but the demand would come, "Count my 422 votes; they are the evidence of the expressed will of a beloved and appreciating constituency; I demand it as a right to have my 422 votes thus polled for me counted at your hands."

Mr. Speaker, gentlemen on the other side say that we must exclude this poll because we cannot rely upon the returns of these villainous officers. So say we. We do not claim that we can rely upon these returns. We give these returns no credit whatever. But we do say that it is the law that we may prove, that the sitting member may prove or that the contestant may prove aliunde his vote. And we do say that the term aliunde is used by the author of the work on American Law of Elections in the broader sense as meaning "from another place." The proof may be made from another place other than the record.

Now, this proof is made in another way and in another place. The four men whose testimony is taken by the contestee, whose names I have already given, each and all of them swear that on election night there were in that box 251 votes. This is outside of the returns. We give no credence to them whatever. We say these returns shall be set aside. But by this aliunde proof that is recognized by and known to the law these parties swear that the contestant has received and that there are in that box 251 votes, and we insist that that proof is just as good to establish the number of votes received by him as it is to establish it by calling upon the persons that cast the ballot. Why? Because in the second proposition of the contestee, in his answer to Le Moyne, he sets out this as one of the issues made:

Second, that a large number of illegal votes—

He specifies a limit—

That a large number of illegal votes, to wit, 100, were cast and counted for you in each and all of the precincts of said district by persons who were not legally entitled to vote in said precincts respectively.

There is the issue again. Mr. Farwell charges upon Mr. Le Moyne that 100 illegal votes were cast for him, Le Moyne, in the first precinct, twentieth ward. Does the proof sustain him? Is there a particle of proof that indicates that a single fraudulent vote was cast? There is not a word, not a single word. Every vote that was cast in that ward for Le Moyne stands unimpeached and unimpeachable upon this issue, because the proof made by the sitting member direct to the issue showed that Le Moyne received no fraudulent votes at the first precinct of the twentieth ward. There is not a single iota of testimony, not a word in any shape or form. We have the proof of the four witnesses to whom I have referred, stating the fact that he did receive 251 lawful votes. These your committee found ought to be counted for Mr. Le Moyne. Mr. Le Moyne, by his testimony, has stripped Mr. Farwell of 252 votes of his 422. Your committee said that that number of votes should be deducted from the 422, and the committee found that the difference between the 252 and the 422 were legal votes cast for Farwell, and then we deducted the difference between the legal votes cast for Farwell thus ascertained and the legal votes of Le Moyne thus ascertained, and then we struck the difference, and gave the benefit to the party to which it belonged, to the man whose hands were not tainted with fraud, to the party who had no part or lot in the perpetration of frauds in that election, to the man who protested that no fraud should be perpetrated, who stood upon a narrow plank placed there for the purpose of voters walking to the window where the ballots were to be deposited and protested that the men of each party should be admitted there, that each was equally interested and was entitled to a challenger, and that the rights of all parties should be respected.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will not discuss the other questions in this case. The other precincts in controversy are the second and fifth precincts of the twentieth ward and the third and fourth precincts of the eighteenth ward and Norwood Park; but I will only say that I most fully agree with the conclusion reached by the majority of the committee in each and every one of these precincts, and have no doubt but that the House will be doing but an act of justice in adopting the report of the majority.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi, obtained the floor.

CENSURE OF HON. JOHN YOUNG BROWN.

Mr. LAMAR. With the consent of my colleague, I ask unanimous consent to offer for adoption the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk relating to a member upon this floor. I will state that I believe the resolution is one which will not be unacceptable to a single member on the floor after you hear the motives which prompt me to present it.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the resolution adopted by the House of Representatives of the Forty-third Congress, on the 3d of February, 1875, as charges prevarication upon Hon. JOHN YOUNG BROWN be, and the same is hereby, rescinded and ordered to be expunged.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object to the resolution; I know nothing about it. I have no other objection than that.

Mr. LAMAR. I trust the gentleman will hear an explanation of the motives which prompt me to present the resolution, and if there is then any objection I will withdraw the resolution.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Speaker, I believe that this resolution will not be unacceptable to a single member of this body when he comes to understand the motive which prompts me to present it.

I have always believed that the action of the last House, referred to in this resolution, was induced by an entire misapprehension of the attitude and purpose of the honorable and distinguished gentleman against whom it was directed. From a long personal acquaintance with him, I believed then, as I have never ceased for a moment to believe since, that he was superior to the arts of equivocation and wholly incapable of disingenuousness and indirectness. On that occasion and upon that particular matter I used the language which I ask the Clerk now to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LAMAR. * * * Now, sir, one word if I may be permitted as to this charge of prevarication in the resolution. I think, Mr. Speaker, you were premature in your censure of the gentleman. I believe you did not intend to be unjust, but I think whatever may be said of the course which the gentleman pursued—and I do not say that it was in accord with the rules of the House—it was not pervaricating.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not use that word.

Mr. LAMAR. I stand corrected.

Mr. COX. It is in the resolution that that word is used.

The SPEAKER. The Chair characterized the gentleman's conduct as "evasive."

Mr. LAMAR. I am glad the Chair has corrected me, and make the amende with pleasure. Still the Chair stated that the answer was not in good faith; that it was evasive. Now, I do not think it will bear even that construction. The gentleman had just finished a sentence with the word "Burking," when the Chair interposed and asked if the gentleman meant to refer to a member upon this floor. The gentleman from Kentucky replied, "No, sir; I call no names." Now, sir, it is very natural for the gentleman from Kentucky to have supposed that the Chair had from a misunderstanding of the name called made the inquiry as to whether he was alluding to a member of the House, and he replied, "No, sir; I called no name." He had evidently intended to refrain from making a personal allusion and to confine himself to a mental characterization so as to avoid being called to order and stopped by the Chair. Such a mode of dealing in severities is not unusual. The Chair repeated the question, and then Mr. BROWN answered, "No, sir; I am having a member in my mind's eye."

The SPEAKER. Not "a member."

Mr. LAMAR. No; I did not mean to say "a member;" but he said, "I am describing an individual whom I have in my mind's eye." Well, sir, he had not, at that time, in point of fact referred to any member. No matter what his objective point was, it is exactly the fact that he had not at that instant violated any rule. Had he stopped at that sentence no member could have been said to have been alluded to. Whatever his intention to do thereafter, he certainly had not as yet made any personal reference. The Speaker's inquiry was a proper one, but the answer it elicited could not I think be construed into a pledge that precluded any personal reference in a subsequent portion of his remarks

I do not believe that the gentleman from Kentucky is capable of disingenuousness.

Mr. LAMAR. Those remarks were made after conference with the gentleman from Kentucky; and when I concluded them he came to my chair and thanked me for my defense and assured me that I had stated exactly the impression upon his mind under which he answered the Speaker's inquiry. Unfortunately, as I then thought and as I still think, my friend, under the reserve which he thought his peculiar position imposed upon him, did not reiterate in his remarks to the House the assurance that he had made privately to me; so that the gentlemen who voted for the resolution did so supposing that my explanation was only arguendo, when in reality it was an authorized version of his intent and feeling.

Anxious that this misunderstanding should be cleared up and the consequences of it repaired, I, at the suggestion of other gentlemen, addressed to my friend from Kentucky a communication requesting him to state in a note to me if I correctly reported him in that debate, and to allow me to use his reply for the purpose of this resolution. I ask the Clerk to read his letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 26, 1876.

DEAR SIR: I have just received your note in which you ask me to state if you correctly represented me in the remarks made by you in the debate on the resolution of censure upon myself in the House of Representatives of the Forty-third Congress. In reply, I will state that you certainly did. You will remember that on that occasion, before you took the floor, I explained to you how I had misunderstood the Speaker, and, after you had concluded your remarks, I went to your seat and thanked you for what you had said.

The facts of the case are that, when I was interrupted in my remarks by an inquiry from the Speaker, I had just used the word "Burking." Supposing the Speaker had mistaken that word for the name of a member; conscious also of the fact that, up to that point, I had made no personal application of my remarks to any one, and understanding his inquiry to be whether I had referred to the name of a member, my reply to him was in the negative—that I was describing an individual who was in my "mind's eye"—and added, in my second reply, that I had "called no names."

The personal application of my remarks was made after this colloquy.

The question of the Speaker was unexpected—put in the midst of my remarks—and misapprehended, answered by me under excitement, instantly, without reflection for a second, with the impression on my mind as stated, and most certainly without any purpose of disingenuousness.

Precisely what I have now stated was said to you at the time referred to.

On that occasion I made no explanation to the House, and felt that I ought not, as I was under the menace of the resolution of censure then pending.

Hon. Robert S. Hale, of New York, the author of the resolution of censure, when he afterward learned the facts, not able by reason of his illness to come to the House of Representatives, voluntarily wrote, as you know, an earnest and magnanimous letter, which was read during the closing hours of the Forty-third Congress, in which he stated that great injustice had been done me.

Very truly, your friend,

JOHN YOUNG BROWN.

Hon. L. Q. C. LAMAR.

Mr. LAMAR. I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read the marked portion of the letter of Mr. Hale, the author of the resolution referred to in the letter just read.

The Clerk read as follows:

But a careful examination of the record since, qualifying it by my own distinct recollection, satisfies me that I did a great wrong to Mr. BROWN in imputing this intent to him, and that there was nothing in his response to the Speaker inconsistent with entire good faith or with the integrity of an upright and honorable man.

I regret that I could not have stated this conviction of mine upon the floor of the House, and have thus aided in wiping out the undeserved imputation upon Mr. BROWN in this regard inflicted by my resolution; but my continued illness has kept me from my seat now for nearly four weeks, and will prevent my taking it again during the session.

I am glad to have the opportunity of expressing myself thus freely and unreservedly to you, especially in view of the opinion I have always entertained of Mr. BROWN as a gentleman of the most perfect integrity and honor, though doubtless sometimes excitable and impulsive, as I think he was on the occasion in question.

I shall never hesitate to express freely the conviction I have above expressed to you, and if anything contained in this letter will, in your judgment, be of service to Mr. BROWN, I beg you to consider the letter entirely at your service for any use whatever which you or other friends of Mr. BROWN may think proper to make of it.

With sentiments of the highest regard for yourself, I am, very truly, your obedient servant,

ROBT. S. HALE.

Hon. T. T. CRITTENDEN.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, the subject brought to the attention of the House by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] recalls to my mind that one of the most painful acts I was ever called to take part in was administering the censure of the House upon the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BROWN.] And I am compelled here to say that, if the gentleman from Kentucky had that evening, under the excitement, found himself cool enough to have said to the House what he has now written so frankly and fully, I am very sure the vote of censure never would have been passed. There was a great deal of excitement, there was a great deal of confusion, and it is perhaps true that there was a great deal of temper. And yet a word from the gentleman from Kentucky at that time, who shared as fully in the temper as any member on the floor, would have averted the very unpleasant conclusion of that day's excitement.

I have taken a good deal of pains myself since then, by conference with various parties in greater or less degree connected with that event, including the gentleman from Kentucky himself, to possess myself of all the facts of the case. And my most deliberate and candid and complete conclusion is that the gentleman from Kentucky did not in any way intend to prevaricate or deceive the House; that is my conclusion and my belief. I think it all arose from confusion and undue excitement, and, to speak with entire frankness, from a great deal too much temper on the part of the gentleman from Kentucky at that moment which forbade him saying what he has now said in his letter.

My own judgment is that justice, not to speak of generosity, requires that this House should do what the gentleman from Mississippi has asked them to do in the resolution he has offered. My own personal acquaintance with the gentleman from Kentucky dates back some years, and I knew of him and about him many years before I met him. I have had reason to know something of the people of his State, and I am sure I do not go beyond what is the strict limit of the severest truth when I say that there is no single chapter or feature in the previous or the subsequent history of the gentleman from Kentucky that would lead the House to suppose that under any circumstances he would knowingly be guilty of prevarication; and I hope, speaking from a position of somewhat peculiar knowledge of this subject, that so far as this side of the House are concerned this resolution may be unanimously adopted.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I have not the honor of a personal acquaintance with the gentleman alluded to in the resolution now before this House. He holds a seat on this floor, and for that reason, if for no other, I should presume him to be a high-minded and honorable man.

I have no wish, in anything I may say on this occasion, to hint or intimate any opinion in regard to what has been discussed by the gentlemen who have spoken upon this resolution, unfavorable to the gentleman from Kentucky; not one word. But I am opposed to this resolution and shall not vote for it. My reason is that I do not believe that the matter properly comes before us for consideration. It was a matter for the last House, and if the last House committed a wrong, certainly we cannot determine what that wrong was. I speak now of those who are members of this House and were not members of the last House. For one I do not propose to censure the last House.

Mr. HOAR. I was not present in the House, although I was a member of the last House at the time the transaction referred to took place. I was then absent in the State of Louisiana by order of the House on public business; and my engagements on my return were such that I had no opportunity to read or examine with any care the debates upon the subject, and I have never been in a position to form an opinion upon the propriety of the action of the last House.

It seems to me, however, that where proper evidence is obtained, it is proper for one House to rescind a resolution passed by another House. The last House itself furnishes a very notable precedent in that direction. During the war the House of Representatives passed a vote of censure upon a gentleman then at the head of the War Department, and afterward and now a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania. Members of the last House, of the political party opposed to that gentleman—I think one of them, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] himself had voted for and supported the original resolution of censure—proposed to the last House to rescind that resolution, which was done; so that the precedent was then established.

It seems to me, however, that the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] goes a little further than this House has any constitutional right to go, in the last clause, which directs that resolution of censure to be expunged.

Mr. LAMAR. I think the point well taken; and will modify the resolution so as to stop at the word "rescinded." I concur with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] that the resolution had better not go to the extent of declaring the former resolution expunged.

Mr. HOAR. I was about to say that there are but two or three cases in history where a body bound by a constitution or by its own usages to keep a journal has undertaken to deal with that journal by resolutions of expunging. Those were cases where the expunging was based upon the ground that the original resolution had been a usurpation, that the power to do the act the record of which was expunged was a usurpation. The one case was that of John Wilkes, and the other the case of the famous resolutions of the Senate concerning President Jackson.

Now, it seems to me that the statement made by the Speaker of the last House, whose official duty it was to administer this censure, that he has carefully and thoroughly re-examined the case and has come to the conclusion that the action of the last House ought to be rescinded, is enough to justify this House in removing from one of its members the very heavy burden its censure for such a cause has laid upon him.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. The resolution having been modified in such form as not necessarily to imply in any respect a censure of the last House, I will withdraw my objection to it.

Mr. LAMAR. The expression referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] in the latter part of my resolution was an inadvertence, and I think the criticism he has made is just.

Mr. HURLBUT. Let the resolution as modified be now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the resolution adopted by the House of Representatives of the Forty-third Congress, on the 3d day of February, 1875, as charges prevarication upon Hon. JOHN YOUNG BROWN be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

Mr. BLAINE. Gentlemen will observe, and it is only fair that the House should observe this, that this resolution proposes to rescind so much of the resolution adopted by the last House of Representatives as charges prevarication. That the gentleman from Kentucky on that day did behave in an unparliamentary manner in transgressing what is called the proprieties of debate is not here brought into question. That is a matter which too many of us are guilty of, to draw any very fine points upon. The question is one that affects the gentleman's personal honor.

The question being taken on agreeing to the resolution of Mr. LAMAR, it was adopted unanimously.

ELECTION CONTEST—LE MOYNE VS. FARWELL.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by the Committee of Elections upon the case of Le Moyne vs. Farwell, from the third congressional district of Illinois.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I am not willing to allow this debate to close without expressing my dissent from the views expressed by some of my colleagues upon the committee in this debate, and in doing so I desire to approach this subject divesting myself of all partisan feeling, and to consider it as presented in the evidence and apply the rules of law as established both by this House and by the courts of the country. I hope that the House in considering the case will give it an impartial consideration, divesting itself of all partisan feeling and weighing the evidence judicially. Contested-election cases should certainly be considered by the House, as far as possible, as a court would consider them. In my opinion this House, when it has under consideration these questions, is resolved into a judicial body. We have no interest as to the individuals or their partisan character. Our aim should be to follow rules that shall be in conformity with established precedents and not in violation of them.

The committee have disagreed upon certain propositions and have agreed fully upon others. Before considering the particular precincts upon which we disagreed, I wish the House to understand distinctly the question that comes before it for consideration. The committee agree in regard to every precinct and every poll in the third congressional district except the first precinct of the twentieth ward, the third precinct of the eighteenth ward, and what is known as the Norwood Park precinct. A majority of the committee, two democrats and four republicans, agreed that the first precinct of the twentieth ward should be excluded. In other words, while the majority of the committee agree as to the result, they disagree as to the first precinct of the twentieth ward.

Let me read the statement of two members of the majority of the committee in regard to the first precinct of the twentieth ward:

> We concur in the result reached by the report of a majority of the committee, to wit: That Le Moyne was elected and that Farwell was not. But we cannot concur in that portion of the report which seeks to purge the poll at precinct No. 1 in twentieth ward of Chicago. The conduct of the officers of election having been shown to be grossly fraudulent, and the integrity of their returns at this poll having been thereby destroyed, and the proof having shown, also, that the ballots in the box had been tampered with, we can come to no other conclusion than to reject the entire vote at this precinct, except in so far as contestant and contestee have established by proof aliunde the number of votes they received at this poll respectively.
> JNO. F. HOUSE.
> CHARLES P. THOMPSON.

Thus it will be seen that the majority of the committee agree that the first precinct of the twentieth ward should be excluded; but in regard to the third precinct of the eighteenth ward the majority contend that it should be excluded, and the minority that it should be counted; and as to the Norwood Park precinct, the majority hold that the paupers in that precinct were entitled to vote, while the minority hold that they had no such right under the laws of the State of Illinois. I shall therefore confine my remarks to these three precincts, namely, first precinct, twentieth ward; third precinct, eighteenth ward; and Norwood Park precinct. There is no member of the committee who has addressed the House upon this subject but what has admitted that the first precinct of the twentieth ward was covered all over with fraud and corruption from the very inception of the election down to the time when the votes were counted; my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. POPPLETON,] admits this fact. But he contends that Mr. Farwell was responsible, and upon this point I wish to reply to him by saying that at the time this election was held Chicago was under the control of a democratic administration; the board of commissioners that appointed the commissioners of election were democratic, and every one of the commissioners who held that election in the first precinct of the twentieth ward was democratic. There was not a republican on that board. Besides, when the gentleman characterizes the individuals who voted at that poll as having been drawn from the slums of society in Chicago, I want to tell him that that ward was always democratic and was so at that time. But a division occurred on account of Mr. Le Moyne having been previously an abolitionist; he had been nominated by the liberal party; there was no regular democratic candidate in the field; for some reason the democratic vote was divided, a part of it being cast for Le Moyne and a part for Farwell. And whatever irregularities occurred at that poll, it certainly comes with poor grace from the other side of this House to charge it upon republicans, who had nothing to do with the management of that election.

The evidence shows that from the time the election at that poll was opened until it was closed in the evening men voted from vacant lots; they voted from other precincts; they repeated. But, says my friend from Ohio, there is not a particle of evidence tending to show that Le Moyne received a single illegal vote, but that Farwell received them all. Certainly my colleague on the committee must have forgotten the evidence, for if he will examine the record he will find that out of fifty-six names of persons who voted at the precinct, but resided out of it, Le Moyne received 6 and Farwell 41, while 23 were not found in the box. It is also shown that of the persons who voted from vacant lots, 16 votes were cast for Farwell and 1 for Le Moyne, while 8 were not found in the box. The gentleman, if he had examined the evidence, would also have found that of the repeaters and those who voted from fictitious residences, 126 of the whole number voted for Farwell, 26 for Le Moyne, and 53 were not found in the box. It is proved that the commissioners excluded challengers at that poll; that riot ran rampant; that violence to some extent existed there that day; but the contest was not over the member of Congress, but over members of the board of aldermen. Right here let me remark that if you will examine the evidence you will find that so far as Mr. Farwell's partisan friends were concerned, they were not responsible for the irregularities that occurred; that it was conducted by men appointed by a democratic board of commissioners under the law of the State of Illinois.

Nor was Farwell, the contestee, more responsible for the frauds practiced at that poll than was Le Moyne, the contestant.

Very well, the commiteee agree that frauds were practiced, that all day long it was a scene of fraud, and that when the votes were counted and returned the return gave Mr. Farwell 171 majority.

We come now to the evidence as presented before the committee as to what the result of that election was by the actual count of the votes. Let us go one step further as to the custody of these ballots. The law of Illinois provides that when the election is over the ballots and the poll-books shall be sealed in an envelope and transmitted to the county clerk of the county. The testimony shows that the commissioners discharged their duty in this particular and transmitted properly sealed the ballots and poll-lists to one Hermann Leib. From that time until the evidence in this contested case was taken the ballot-boxes were in the custody of this man Leib, county clerk of Cook County.

The committee having agreed that the election itself was fraudulent, that the acts of the commissioners were fraudulent, that the acts of the commissioners nullified the return, we are left to the ballots. It is a well-established principle of law, sustained by numerous precedents in this House, that when the ballots themselves are not tainted with fraud they will be evidence to show what the actual vote polled would be.

In order to show precisely the weight to be given to these votes as evidence it will be necessary to understand who it was who had the custody and control of these ballots after they left the hands of the commissioners of election. The law provides that the county clerk shall have the custody of them. Who, therefore, is the county clerk, and what his character? He was a man named Hermann Leib. He was brought before the notaries in this examination as a witness for the contestant. I wish to read from the record to show you the disposition of the man, and his character as it is portrayed in this evidence. I do not believe when this House understands this question they will be willing to commit so monstrous a disgrace as to seat a man whose only title to a seat is the evidence of ballots which have been in the custody of a man like Hermann Lieb, whom the evidence shows to be covered all over with infamy, and who cannot under any circumstance be regarded as worthy of confidence.

I read the very first question on page 28 that is put to him; and I will follow this through, and I wish the House to follow the evidence with me in reference to this man's conduct while upon the stand:

> Question. Are you, as county clerk, by the laws of Illinois, ex officio a member of the board of canvassers of the election returns of Cook County?

That is a question propounded to him by the contestant's counsel. What is his answer? He answers affirmatively:

> Answer. I am the presiding officer of said board.

He is next turned over to the contestee's counsel when the same identical question is propounded to him that had been propounded by the contestant's counsel, and I want the House to mark what is his answer.

> Q. Were you not and are you not still clerk of the board of county commissioners?
> A. I am not certain about that either.
> Q. Are you not ex officio such clerk?
> A. Such appears to be the law.

That is his answer, when just turned over from the contestant's counsel. That is the way in which he answers a question propounded to him by the contestee's counsel.

Again, he comes forward with certain documents to be presented to this committee. The witness Leib has been introducing certain affidavits in reference to certain voters, and the counsel for the contestee asks that these affidavits shall be attached to and accompany their depositions.

> Q. Do you refuse to permit these affidavits about which you have just testified to be attached to or accompany your testimony as exhibits and part of your testimony?
> A. I do, until requested to do so by proper authority.
> Q. What do you consider proper authority?
> A. Persons or authorities or parties whose premises it is to judge of the law in such cases.
> Q. Do you consider the notaries before whom this testimony is taken as such authority?

A. I do not.

(Mr. Van Buren, contestee's counsel, notes the following: That he has introduced these affidavits in evidence, that they are now on the table before the notaries, and that if the witness takes them away he does it against the objection and protest of the contestee. Witness says that if anybody else except the proper authority takes them and puts them in his pocket, he will have to do with him.)

Q. Do I understand you to mean that if the notaries attempt to take possession of these affidavits for the purpose heretofore mentioned that you will resist such attempt by force?

A. Of course I will; and, furthermore, if I am strong enough I will boot them out of this house.

A MEMBER. What page is that to be found on?

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. Page 33 of the record.

Now on page 34 of the same record, in the testimony of this same man Leib, you will find the following:

Q. In ballot 291 of same precinct is not the name of Charles B. Farwell plainly apparent, and is there any other name for Representative on the ticket?

A. The name of Charles B. Farwell is plainly printed on the ticket and as plainly scratched. There appears no other name on the ticket for Representative to Congress.

(Mr. Van Buren now offers these tickets in evidence, and insists that they shall be attached to this testimony as exhibits. Witness refuses to deliver them into the possession of the notaries.)

This same witness again answers:

Q. Look at ballot number 106, from the fifth precinct, twentieth ward. Is not the name of John V. Le Moyne erased and a name written in pencil, which denotes the intention of the voter to vote for Charles B. Farwell, in your opinion?

A. The name of John V. Le Moyne is erased. My opinion is the voter intended to throw it for Charles B. Farwell.

(Mr. Van Buren now offers the ballot in evidence, and insists that it be attached to this testimony as an exhibit. Witness refuses to deliver it to the possession of the notaries.)

The same is the case in reference to ballot 142. He refuses again to allow them to be used as an exhibit on the part of the contestee.

Here is the same witness on page 135, when under cross-examination by the contestee's counsel:

Q. Have you in your possession the ballots, affidavits, and poll-book of the town of Norwood Park, in this county, and will you produce them for inspection and evidence?

Mr. Le Moyne objects, as this is not cross-examination; objects to his time being consumed in taking evidence on the part of contestee. Then this witness Leib, answers:

A. I think the objection holds good. I have the ballots, affidavits, and poll-books in my possession, and shall produce them at the request of the contestee.

Q. Well, sir, produce them.

A. I meant to have said contestant when I said contestee in the above answer.

Q. Do you refuse to produce them?

A. I do not, if they are required in proper order.

Q. Do you refuse to produce them now, at my request?

A. I do.

Q. Will you produce them at our request when we take testimony upon the part of the contestee?

A. When that time comes I will be ready with the answer.

This, then, is the manner of this individual in giving his testimony, showing his partisan zeal, showing that he was willing to furnish evidence to the contestant but that he was not willing to furnish evidence to the contestee. He in every way evaded giving testimony and producing documents for the contestee.

Let me go one step further. These votes that are proposed to be taken and counted for the purpose of creating a majority for Le Moyne were under the control, direction, and supervision of this man Leib. Where were they deposited? He answers that they were deposited in the vault of the county clerk's office.

Question. Where is this vault where these ballots and affidavits were kept?

Answer. In the clerk's office on the main floor.

Q. Who opens this vault in the morning and who closes it at night?

A. The chief deputy Drury or Deputy Cornienti or Mr. Henry Metz, the clerk in charge of books and papers, the only ones who have the combination of the vault.

Q. What time is it opened usually in the morning and at what time at night is it usually closed?

A. About eight in the morning and about five in the evening, except when it is night-work and the books are out.

Q. Is the office where the vault is your principal office?

A. It is.

Q. How many clerks and deputies have you?

A. I have nine deputies and clerks according to necessity; sometimes ten.

Q. Who appoints your deputies and clerks?

A. I do.

Q. Which of your clerks and deputies have access to this vault?

A. All the deputies, and Max Schuller, Henry Metz, and Adam Kimpling, clerks.

Q. What is kept or deposited at different times in this vault?

A. The tax-books in hand of the clerks and all the papers of the county court, estates, wills, &c.

Q. Give the location of your offices, the number of rooms, where your private office is, and state in which office you pass most of your time during business hours.

A. The main office is on the main floor, occupying the north wing of the building. My private office is across the hall; and I pass my time most in my private office. I have five rooms altogether.

One step further. How were these ballots sealed? The evidence shows that they were in envelopes sealed with wax or with mucilage, and when sealed with wax the seal that was used was a United States copper cent. These envelopes were brought before the notary for examination. The contestee's counsel objected to their being broken until the commissioner who sealed them should be brought into the presence of the court to examine and testify that they were in the same condition as when they were delivered to this man Leib. But instead of that Le Moyne's counsel insisted that the seals should be then and there broken immediately; giving no opportunity for calling witnesses for the purpose of ascertaining whether the envelopes were in the same condition as when received by the county clerk; and they were then and there broken, and the evidence, if evidence existed of the fact, was destroyed as to whether they had ever been tampered with or not.

Certainly it is remarkable and extraordinary that, in a case under examination by a court which involved the necessity that the envelopes containing these papers should be exactly in the same condition as when they were received by the county clerk, such haste should be made to destroy the evidence of the fact and no evidence allowed to be introduced to determine for the satisfaction of this House whether they were in the same condition as when the commissioners turned them over to this man Leib.

Again these envelopes, in which the ballots and poll-lists were sealed, are described by law. Now this man Leib testifies—I will not read the evidence; it is on page 31—that he had the envelopes printed himself. And he testifies further that he got a larger number printed than was necessary for the use of the various precincts in the third congressional district. He swears, furthermore, that he has in his possession, at the time of this examination, blank envelopes; and he produces the blank envelopes, exactly similar to the ones which contained the ballots that were opened. He also admits, as we might conclude of necessity from the state of facts arising out of the case, that he had copper coins of the denomination of one cent in his office. I would like to know what there was to have prevented an unscrupulous man, such as the evidence shows Leib to be, from opening these envelopes containing the ballots, manipulating them, changing the numbers, and altering their contents, especially when he swears he has a pecuniary interest in the election of Le Moyne?

When we open the envelopes containing the ballots we find—what? One hundred and eighty-three votes gone; 183 votes less than there are names on the poll-list that are marked as having voted. What more? We find 198 duplicate and triplicate votes. For instance we find John Jones of such a number voted three times; twice for Le Moyne, once for Farwell; and we find that John Smith voted three times; once for Le Moyne, twice for Farwell. And we find the numbers upon the tickets disagree throughout with the numbers on the poll-list.

Now, will you tell me that those ballots can be relied upon for the purpose of determining the will of the electors in that district? The commissioners who received the votes, all agree, acted fraudulently. The ballots were in the custody of this Leib, and when the ballots were opened they were found to be so disarranged that it was impossible to determine whether they were the same votes as had been cast or whether they had been placed there by some unauthorized individual. I therefore conclude, and I believe the House will conclude, that fraud not only commenced on the morning of the election but continued clear through to the county clerk's office, and that the whole vote at this poll was covered with corruption and fraud, and should be rejected. What further? William A. Hettick testifies, on page 378, as follows:

Question. Are you acquainted with General Leib, the county clerk of this county?

Answer. Yes sir.

Q. Did you, on or before the last congressional election in this State, make a bet with General Leib? If so, what was that bet?

A. He bet me a hundred dollars that Mr. Farwell was not going to be elected and I bet he would be.

Q. Was the money put up? If so, in whose hands, and has the bet been paid, and, if not, why?

A. The money has been put up in Otto Schoeninger's hands. The bet is not paid. The general says it has not been decided to his satisfaction.

Mr. HURLBUT. I suppose this proceeding is to give this man his $100?

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. Yes, sir, that would appear to be the object of it. But on page 30, this man Leib, this specimen of honesty, this man who comes forward with ballots that you are asked to count for Le Moyne, after they have been in his hands, and after they have been in the hands of the commissioners who have been proved to be guilty of gross negligence and fraud, this man Leib says again, on page 30, in answer to the following interrogatory:

Q. What are your politics and by what party were you elected?

A. My politics are according to circumstances. I was elected by a party called at the time "people's party."

Q. Were you not active in the campaign to secure the success of the regular ticket upon which the contestant was placed?

A. I never blow my own horn. I leave my political friends to determine that question.

Q. Did you not labor for the success of that ticket?

A. I tried to convince the voters of Cook County that I was the best man for county clerk.

Q. Were you not active in the campaign to secure the success of the regular ticket upon which the contestant was placed?

A. I was.

Q. Did you not have a pecuniary interest in the election of John V. Le Moyne?

A. I refuse to answer that question.

Q. Did you not make any bets on his election?

A. That is nobody's business whether I did or not.

Q. Do you refuse to answer the question?

A. I do.

Q. Do you refuse to answer these questions for the reason the answer might criminate you?

A. The reasons for the refusal are within my breast.

This is the individual who had the custody and the sole custody of the ballots that are brought forward and are now before this House to be counted in order to build up a majority to seat Mr. Le Moyne, when it is known that at the time these ballots were opened 183 ballots were gone and 198 other ballots were either triplicate or duplicate of the numbers on the back of them. I think this House will hesitate some time before they will be willing to accept as evidence ballots coming from so doubtful, not to say corrupt source, as a means of determining the majority at this poll, especially when the ballots themselves show that they have been manipulated, and do not in hardly any particular agree with the poll-lists.

My colleague on the committee from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] says that the grandest sleight-of-hand performance took place where the evidence was being taken in this case that the world has ever witnessed; that the poll-list of this precinct was stolen right under the eyes of the notary public and the two counselors of the parties.

Now what particle of evidence is there to sustain this statement? There is not a word of evidence that such was the case; but that man Leib, this pure individual, certified to what? Here is where my friend from Virginia falls into an error. He certified that this is the true poll-list of the votes cast at the first precinct of the twentieth ward. How? Hear him. I read from his certificate:

I, Hermann Leib, clerk of the county court of Cook County, in the State aforesaid, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the poll-book of the first precinct of the twentieth ward of the city of Chicago, returned by the judges of election of November 3, 1874, for said precinct, the original of which, after being copied, having been stolen from the county commissioner's room while the testimony was being taken in the contest between John V. Le Moyne and Charles B. Farwell, said poll-book having been taken there at the request of said parties.

So we have not even the original poll-book. This man Leib, whom I have described to the House and whose evidence I have been reading, is the man who certifies that this is a correct transcript of the original poll-book; but no poll-book has been furnished, and we have nothing but Leib's testimony to the fact that it is a correct copy of the book.

What are you going to do in such a case? Are you going to take the evidence of a man who shows himself as actuated by partisan feeling and prejudice, whose evidence shows that his conduct was infamous; a man who, when called upon to testify the facts within his knowledge, refuses to do so because it was benefiting the contestee; a man who acknowledged, by his refusal to answer, that he has a pecuniary interest in the election; a man who confessed that he has no politics, but that he sells himself to the highest bidder, and that he will not only do that, but will do all the swearing necessary for the purpose of seating the contestant, in order that he may reap pecuniary benefit. This is the evidence and the only evidence on which the majority of the committee in this case rely for the purpose of establishing the true vote of that precinct. Sir, I believe that this House will not be willing to take such proof as to the vote of the first precinct of the twentieth ward for the purpose of seating or unseating any man.

Now what was proved outside? Mr. Farwell and Mr. Le Moyne proved a certain number of votes aliunde; and the minority of the committee agree with two of the majority that those votes which were proved outside shall be counted. We understand that to be the correct rule.

A word more before I dismiss this matter. I want the House to bear with me, because I desire that the evidence in this case shall go before the country and this man Leib shall be known wherever the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is read, that his true character shall be understood, and that the manner in which this election was carried on in Chicago shall be understood. On page 309 of the record in this case you will find this testimony. Frederick Becker testifies as follows:

Question. Do you know Hermann Leib, the county clerk of Cook County?
Answer. I do.
Q. Did you have any correspondence with him, or communication from him, also conversation with him, relative to the return of that precinct?

This was the second precinct of the twentieth ward. There is no contest over that. We all agree about that; I simply refer to the evidence in the further consideration of the character of Leib who had the custody of these ballots:

Question. If so, state when, and where, and all about it.
Answer. About three or four days I think, after the election, General Leib sent a deputy sheriff over to my store, and also to Brauhn and Asmus, that we should appear the next morning at 9 o'clock in his office. I told him I didn't know what for, that our report was correct. We appeared there the next morning, the three of us, Fred. Becker, John Brauhn, and Theo. Asmus, judges of second precinct of the twentieth ward. General Leib wanted us to give Le Moyne 10 votes more on the tally-list, and we would not do it and we did not do it, because I told him our reports was correct.

This man Leib sent for the judges of the second precinct of the twentieth ward after their return had been made through a deputy sheriff and demanded that the commissioners should falsify their return and give Mr. Le Moyne 10 more votes. I read further on:

Theodore Asmus put all the two reports, one of which belongs to the judges, into the ballot-box, which one report was exactly correct, as the votes corresponded with the one that belonged to the county. I asked General Leib that he would show us the two reports. He said he had only one, and that we must correct that or he would punish us, and I told him we didn't care. I told him I would not correct it; then he got excited and said, "You will not?" and I said, "No." So we left the county-court room.
Q. When were the ballots and packages returned to the county clerk?
A. I think it was the next day after election, as everything was done that night.
Q. Did you appear before the board of canvassers?
A. I was there at that time.
Q. Was Hermann Leib one of that board?
A. He was.
Q. State whether you made it appear to the satisfaction of all parties that your returns were correct at that time.
A. Yes, sir; I did.
* * * * * * *
Q. Who kept the tally-sheets during the election?
A. The two clerks of the election.
Q. Who had charge of the tally-sheets while the votes were canvassed?
A. The clerks, I think.
Q. Were your returns as made out on the night of election correct?
A. Yes, sir, as far as we know, because the canvassers found it so in the county court.

But, again, I notice upon page 480 three of the judges of election make their solemn affidavit that this man Leib sent for them and attempted to force them to change the return they had made in favor of Le Moyne and to give him 10 more votes, in order that with the vote in the Norwood Park precinct and others he might give Mr. Le Moyne a small majority and give him a prima facie case to a seat in this House. I read from page 480:

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
Cook County, ss:

Fred. Becker, Theodore Asmus, and John Brauhn, being each duly sworn, upon their several oaths depose and say, each for himself, that they were, and each of them, duly appointed, sworn in, and acted as the judges of election in the second precinct of the twentieth ward, on the 3d day of November instant. That they duly canvassed and counted the votes polled at said precinct, and made, completed, and executed their proper official return, and duly forwarded the same to the county clerk of Cook County. Deponents further say that they and each of them were ordered by one of the clerks or employés of the county clerk to be and appear before said county clerk at nine o'clock this morning; that in response to said order or request these deponents, and each of them, did appear before said county clerk, when said county clerk demanded of these deponents, and of each of them, that they alter their official return (by them made as aforesaid) in this behalf, that the votes counted for Charles B. Farwell for Congressman of the third district, which by the fact and by said official return count 286, be changed to 276.

These deponents further say that they, and each of them, indignantly refused to alter their said official returns; and further say not.

THEODORE ASMUS.
FRED. BECKER.
JOHN BRAUHN.

Severally subscribed and sworn to before me this 12th day of November, A. D. 1874.

[SEAL.] WILLIAM BEYE,
Notary Public.

Now is a man who was guilty of all that the evidence shows this man Leib to have been guilty of a fit repository of ballots; and will this House take ballots from his hands and count them for the purpose of seating a person who was not elected? If the returns from the other precincts outside of this are to be relied upon, in other words, reject the returns from the first precinct of the twentieth ward, where there is no contest, except some slight irregularities I have mentioned, and Mr. Farwell was elected. Throw out the box, count the paupers' votes, and count the returns from the third precinct of the eighteenth ward, and Mr. Farwell is elected even then by three majority.

Now, will this House because of partisan feeling arbitrarily seat a man who was not elected; take the votes that have been in the custody of such a man as Leib, a man whom the majority of the committee agree cannot be relied upon? Will the House do that? That is to be seen. If it is done, then let me say to you that you throw open wide the doors of fraud, and in the not far future it may be that contests will be multiplied and frivolous pretexts will be seized upon to defeat the will of the people, and this House will elect its own members, ignoring the wish of the electors. I think it is the duty of this House to examine and scrutinize the evidence in order to ascertain as far as in their power the will of the electors, and to recognize that will when so ascertained, regardless of partisan prejudice.

It is laid down by McCrary in his excellent work, The American Law of Election, and established by precedents of this House over and over again, that it is one thing to reject a return and quite a different thing to reject a poll; that when a poll is so tainted with fraud that it is unreliable this House will reject the whole poll, and will then rely upon evidence aliunde to establish what the vote was If that rule is correct, then it should be applied to this case.

I now pass to the third precinct of the eighteenth ward. In regard to this precinct the majority of the committee decide that the returns should be rejected, while the minority of the committee decide that the returns should be retained and counted. There have been but four witnesses introduced in regard to this particular precinct. You may search the record through and through, and you will not find another word than that which I intend to read to this House. If you can find any rule of law or precedent, from the foundation of this Government to the present day, that will justify this House in rejecting the return I have nothing to say. I now propose to read the testimony of Daniel Kilroy, on page 154 of the record. I regret exceedingly that no more attention is given to these contested-election cases. It is a matter of vital importance to this House that a correct decision should be reached, that injustice should not be done to the electors at home. It makes not so much difference in regard to the individual contestant and contestee; it is the will of the people that we are to ascertain, and we should give to that will the authority that is due to it. I therefore will tax the House by presenting all the evidence bearing upon this poll, that those who have not yet read the record may judge for themselves.

DANIEL KILROY, a witness produced and sworn on behalf of contestant, testifies as follows:

Direct examination by Mr. LE MOYNE:

Question. What is your name, age, and place of residence, and how long have you resided there?

Answer. My name is Daniel Kilroy; my age is forty-one; my place of residence is 94 Ontario; have resided in the neighborhood since the fire.

Q. Did you, on the day following the election of November 3, 1874, see the ballot-box of the third precinct of the eighteenth ward; if so, where did you see it and who had charge of it?

A. I've seen it in Stock's saloon, Sedgwick street, where the polls had been. It seems no one had charge of it; it was standing behind the bar, on end. There was nobody in that room, but in the adjoining room Stock was attending to a grocery business.

Mark you, the majority of the committee decide that these returns shall be rejected, because the box was in the custody of an unauthorized person; and this is the only witness who testifies to that effect.

Q. Were there any of the officers of the election of that precinct in the adjoining room or in the house?

A. There might have been up-stairs, but there was none in that concern or on that floor.

Q. Were the ballots then in the box and was the box sealed or opened?

A. The box was not sealed. I couldn't tell whether the ballots were in there or not. Stock said he thought they were, and shook it by the handle.

Q. Did the judges afterward count the ballots and make their returns; if so, when?

A. They took the box out of that room to a building in the rear of that lot, and remained there three or four hours, and came back with the returns.

Q. What time of the day was it that they took this ballot-box from the saloon?

A. About ten o'clock in the morning.

Q. What time was it when you first saw the box in the saloon?

A. About eight o'clock in the morning.

Q. Do you know if the box had been in the saloon all night?

A. Stock and the judges told me it was.

Q. After the judges came out of the back building, as you have stated, did they then announce the result of the count?

A. Yes, sir.

Cross-examination by Mr. VAN BUREN:

Q. Where were you on the day of the election?

A. I was judge of election of the fourth precinct of the eighteenth ward.

Q. Were you at the third precinct of the eighteenth ward on the day of election?

A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know whether or not the judges of that precinct on the night of the election counted the ballots?

A. They told me they did.

Q. Do you know whether there was any difference between the count for Congressman on the night of the election and the count for Congressman on the next day when the ballots were counted and returns made?

A. I do not.

Q. When you saw the ballot-box on the counter as you have described, did you open the box or see what its contents were?

A. I have not said that I saw it on the counter. I saw it standing behind the counter. I didn't lay my hands at all on it.

Q. Did you handle the box at all?

A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know whether the box was locked or not?

A. This man, Stock, said it was locked.

Q. When you counted the ballots of the fourth precinct of the eighteenth ward did you seal that ballot-box?

A. Yes.

Q. Is there any law that requires ballot-boxes to be sealed?

A. I believe not; but the law requires to put them into official envelopes and seal them.

Q. Can you state that the ballots in the third precinct, eighteenth ward, were not strung and in an envelope which was sealed up and in that box at the time you saw it?

A. The judges told me they were strung, but not sealed.

Q. Do you know of your own knowledge whether they were sealed or not?

A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know of your own knowledge that there were any ballots in that box at all when you saw it?

A. No, sir.

Q. What judge was it that you had a conversation with relative to these ballots and box, and when and where was it?

A. With Rankin and Leonard. I met Rankin on the street after I had seen the ballot-box, and the conversation occurred there with him. I saw Leonard in his own saloon. The conversation with him occurred there. I saw Clifford, the clerk, at his own house.

Q. Are you acquainted with Elias Shipman, and how long have you been acquainted with him?

A. Yes; about three or four years to know him to be Mr. Shipman, but not acquainted with him personally until now.

Q. Did you see him on the day of election at the window of the polls of the fourth precinct of the eighteenth ward?

A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. If he had been there, interfering for or against a voter, would you not have seen him and be likely to remember that fact?

A. I believe I would.

DANIEL KILROY.

This is every word of evidence tending to show fraud in regard to this box that can be found in this record. Yet the majority would reject the return because, forsooth, there was an opportunity to commit fraud. In other words, if a man is murdered and I am found where I have an opportunity to commit the deed, that is presumptive evidence that I killed the man. Such a doctrine as that, I say, is monstrous and is not sustained by law; it is a doctrine that the mere opportunity to commit fraud necessarily raises the presumption that a fraud was committed. I now read the testimony of the next witness, on page 157:

JAMES HANDLEY, a witness produced and sworn on behalf of the contestant, testifies as follows:

Direct examination by Mr. LE MOYNE:

Question. What is your name, age, and place of residence, and how long have you resided there?

Answer. My name is James Handley; my age is about forty years. I reside at 85 Chicago avenue, second precinct, eighteenth ward; have resided there somewhat over twenty years, excepting the fire, when I was away a few days.

Q. Did you see the ballots of the third precinct of the eighteenth ward on the 4th of November, 1874? If so, at what time of said day? Were they sealed in an envelope or not? State also where you saw them and whether the same were then counted.

A. I saw them the day after election. I am not sure whether it was the 4th or not. I think it was about between ten and eleven in the morning. They were on a string—a string run through them.

The law of Illinois permits that when the votes are counted at night the officers may adjourn until the next morning and then complete their returns, and the ballots shall be strung on a string and inclosed in an envelope and sealed.

They were not in envelopes, but in a cigar-box. They were in a house, upstairs, in the rear, where the election was held. I don't know the number of the house. The judges said they had counted them, two judges; the third wasn't there.

Q. Did they then recount them?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did they make out their official returns?

A. I couldn't say whether they did or not. I counted the ballots and then left.

Q. If you know, state where this ballot-box had been kept from the time the polls closed until it was taken in that back building.

A. I don't know.

Q. Where did you first see it?

A. Up in the back building.

Q. Was it then opened or closed?

A. It was closed.

Q. Did you see it opened?

A. Yes, sir; I saw them open it.

Q. Was the tally-list and poll-book in the box when it was opened?

A. I didn't see any.

Cross-examination by Mr. VAN BUREN:

Q. Where was the election held, and how was that house connected therewith?

A. It was held on Sedgwick street, in a saloon. I don't know the number. The house in the rear was separate from the saloon.

Q. Who were present at the time you saw those ballots there?

A. There was two of the judges—Seaward; the other I don't recollect. One of the clerks, Clifford, Edward Kehoe, Michael and John Sweeney.

Q. Were you present when the ballots were counted on the night of the election?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you know whether the cigar-box where these ballots were put was in the ballot-box?

A. Yes, sir; it was in the ballot-box.

Q. Did you see whether the cigar-box was sealed or not when the ballot-box was opened?

A. No, sir; the lid was lying loose on top.

Q. Were any of these persons that were present at this time candidates for office on the opposition ticket, and for what office?

A. Michael Sweeney was candidate for alderman, eighteenth ward. No one else.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAMAR. Inasmuch as the gentleman was so courteous as to yield to others——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has had his full hour.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I ask permission to complete my remarks.

Mr. HOOKER. I move that the time of the gentleman be extended.

Mr. BLACKBURN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. Probably fifteen minutes.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will not object, but I will say that if the time of the gentleman is extended for fifteen minutes, debate cannot be closed until half past five o'clock, for it was understood that the previous question would be called in two hours after the expiration of his remarks, and that would bring it to fifteen minutes past five.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I ask my colleague on the committee [Mr. BLACKBURN] whether he will not consent to allow me sufficient time—not more than fifteen minutes—to finish my remarks in regard to this precinct?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am not objecting, but simply stating that if the gentleman's time be extended for fifteen minutes, the debate cannot be closed to-day; for even without any extensions of time to any one, it cannot be concluded earlier than quarter past five o'clock

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the extension of the gentleman's time for fifteen minutes; and he will proceed.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. On page 350 John J. Clifford, one of the clerks, gives his testimony as follows:

Question. Were you first duly appointed and sworn in as such clerk?

Answer. I was asked to act, and was sworn in and did act.

Q. Were you present at the opening of the polls on that day?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long did you remain at the polls that day, and act as such clerk?

A. I remained from the opening to the closing of the polls, and then remained to count the ballots.

Q. State whether the votes were all canvassed and counted in your presence, while there?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was that done before the board of election adjourned or separated?

A. I don't know whether they call it adjourned or separated. We left where we had been taking in the votes and went up-stairs and counted them.

Q. Did you do anything more than merely to remove from one room to the other as a matter of convenience to count the votes?

A. That was all, to my knowledge.

Q. State what was done after you got up in the other room up-stairs.

A. We ate supper and counted the votes afterward.

Q. Were all the votes duly canvassed and counted that night?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was it done in the presence of the board of election?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. State who else was present.

A. John Sweeney, Michael Sweeney, Harry Faith, James Nolan, Mr. Fisher (policeman.)
Q. State whether the result of the canvass was then publicly announced by the said board and before the board separated.
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did any one take the result to the police headquarters; if so, who?
A. Mr. Fisher, I think.
Q. Did the vote as announced at that canvass that night correspond with official returns?
A. No, sir.
Q. In what respect did it differ?
A. It differed in the aldermanic count; any further I don't know.
Q. Did it differ in any respect with the vote for Mr. Farwell and Mr. Le Moyne?
A. I think not.
Q. Then I understand you to say that the votes for Mr. Farwell and Mr. Le Moyne, as announced by the board, as you here stated, corresponded with the official returns?
A. I think so.
Q. Do you remember whether or not there was a man by the name of Coffey present at the canvass?
A. I do not.

Redirect:

Q. You have spoken of the first count and the second count; is not the first count a counting of the number of ballots and the number of names on the poll-book?
A. I don't understand the question.
Q. State what you mean by the first count.
A. I mean counting of the ballots and the names on the poll-book.
Q. Did they agree?
A. All except one double vote.
Q. Who was that double vote for; do you remember?
A. I do not.
Q. How soon was that counting had after you went up-stairs, as you have stated, on the night of election?
A. It was commenced within an hour afterward.
Q. Did you continue till you got through?
A. We didn't make up our official returns.
Q. Did you continue the count till you got through?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What did you do next?
A. I believe we went home.
Q. Did you go home before you canvassed the vote?
A. I don't know what you mean by canvassed.
Q. After you ascertained how many votes were cast, did you or did you not then proceed to ascertain who those votes were cast for?
A. We did.
Q. How soon after you had ascertained the number of votes cast did you proceed to ascertain who those votes were cast for?
A. Immediately.
Q. When did you get through with ascertaining who the votes were cast for?
A. About two o'clock in the morning.
Q. Was it after you had thus ascertained who the votes were cast for and the public announcement of the result made, that the ballot-box was left at the grocery, as you have said?
A. Yes, sir; after.
Q. At whose solicitation were the ballots overhauled and recanvassed the next day?
A. Michael Sweeney's, Dan Kilroy, James Handley.
Q. Was this Sweeney running for any office at the same election; and, if so, for what office, and on what ticket?
A. Yes, sir; alderman, on the people's ticket.
Q. Was that the same ticket on which Mr. Le Moyne was running for member of Congress?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who is Handley that you have spoken of, and in what precinct did he live at that time?
A. He lives on Chicago avenue, between Sedgwick and Townsend, in the eighteenth ward.
Q. Was that in the third precinct?
A. I am not positive.
Q. Was he the friend of Mr. Le Moyne or Mr. Farwell in that election?
A. I couldn't swear to it; he was a friend of Sweeney's.
Q. In what precinct did Kilroy live?
A. I know when he was judge, corner of Market and Ontario.
Q. Judge of what?
A. Of election.
Q. Was it in the third precinct that he was judge of election?
A. No, sir.
Q. At the recount, at the request of Sweeney, as you have stated, was there any Farwell men or political friends of his present?
A. I believe not.

Then the vote was canvassed the night of election before the board adjourned, before the box had been placed in the saloon, and was not only announced, as I have shown from this evidence, but a memorandum made by one of the judges was taken by a police officer named Fisher; and that identical memorandum taken that night is here in this record, and it agrees with the returns made by those officers, showing conclusively that there could have been no tampering with the ballot-box on account of it having been left in the saloon. In other words, the presumption that fraud was practiced upon that box because of its having been left in the hands of unauthorized persons is effectually rebutted. The return announced that night as taken down by the judges and carried to headquarters by a police officer is here in this evidence, and it corresponds with the return made the next day by the officers.

That is the evidence of Clifford. I now pass to the testimony of James S. Fisher, on page 353.

Question. Were you there from the opening of the poll to the closing?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. State what you know of the counting of the votes, and the canvassing, and the announcement of the result, and all you know about it.
A. I remained at the polls until the closing of the polls; they then immediately retired to a room up-stairs, in the rear; we then had something to eat; consumed not over half an hour. After our supper, the ballot-box was opened on the table and its contents emptied out. The three judges then counted the number of votes polled at that precinct. There was some dispute in regard to the number of votes polled; they were counted some two or three times, and they then tallied with the poll-book; that is, they corresponded with the number of votes cast as on the poll-book. In straightening out the ballots they discovered a double vote, also a twentieth ward ticket; those were laid on one side and not counted. After straightening these tickets out they commenced to tally, and continued until near one o'clock I then got one of the judges—I think it was Mr. Rankin—to read off the number of votes cast for each candidate, which I entered on my tally-list. After getting the full number of votes cast for each candidate, I asked them if this was the final count. They answered me affirmatively. I then immediately started for headquarters with the report. I mean the police headquarters, the general office.

Cross-examination by Mr. LE MOYNE:

Q. Have you any recollection whether the vote then given to you was the same as the official return as made by the said judges or did you ever see the official return?
A. It was given me that night as the official return; that was my idea when I received it.

On page 364 we have the return given to Fisher that night and taken to police headquarters. The majority for Farwell is 14, corresponding exactly with the return as made by the officers the next day. Therefore I claim that neither the Committee of Elections nor the House have any authority to reject this return upon the mere evidence that a man went into a saloon and saw the ballot-box behind the counter, and because there was thus opportunity to commit a fraud upon that ballot-box. Yet the majority hold that the return should be rejected and the poll excluded because the ballot-box was left exposed. How does this decision accord with the precedents established by this House in previous cases? In the case of Van Rensselaer vs. Van Allen, decided as long ago as 1793—one of the earliest contested-election cases in this House—the irregularities complained of in the conducting of the election were, first, that more ballots were actually given than were computed by the inspectors; second, that the ballot-box was not locked; and, third, that the ballot-box was in the custody of a person not authorized by law to take charge of it. In that case the House agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the allegations of the petitioner do not state corruption nor irregularities of sufficient magnitude under the law of New York to invalidate the election and return of John E. Van Allen to serve as a member of this House; and that therefore the said John E. Van Allen is duly elected.

Then in the case of David Bard, of Pennsylvania, the return which the law required to be made in November was not made till the next June. The House held that in the absence of evidence showing fraud the election was not vitiated.

Again, in the case of Arnold vs. Lea, from the State of Tennessee, the law required that there should be a ballot-box, but the evidence showed that the ballots were deposited in a gourd; that afterward they were tied up in a handkerchief and passed out of the hands of the inspectors. Yet this House, in which there was a democratic majority, decided that the election was not vitiated. In that same case it appeared that after the ballot-box had been closed it was removed by the sheriff, an unauthorized person, and taken to a dry-goods store and given into the hands of a man named Graham, who it was proved was a personal and political enemy of the contestant, and who had sworn that the contestant should not be elected. The sheriff placed the box in that man's store over night, and protest was made against it; the commissioners were appealed to to remove it. Yet the House said that in the absence of proof of fraud it would not unseat that member. I say that from 1794 to the present time there cannot be found a single authority to sustain the action of the committee in rejecting this return because there was merely an opportunity to commit fraud, while there is an entire absence of proof to show that fraud was committed.

In conclusion I wish to recite the rule laid down by Mr. McCrary in his book, the American Law of Elections, pages 331 and 332:

When the result in any precinct has been shown to be so tainted with fraud that the truth cannot be deducible therefrom, then it should never be permitted to form a part of the canvass. The precedents as well as the evident requirements of truth not only sanction, but call for, the rejection of the entire poll, when stamped with the characteristics here shown.

* * * * * * *

The return must stand until such facts are proven as to clearly show that it is not true. When shown to be fraudulent or false, it must fall to the ground. This ruling is well stated by numerous authorities including the following: Blair vs. Barrett, 1 Bartlett, 308; Knox vs. Blair, 1 Bartlett, 52; Howard vs. Cooper, supra; Washburn vs. Voorhees, 2 Bartlett, 54.

The author then quotes with "emphatic approval" the following from the report of the committee in the case of Washburn vs. Voorhees:

If the fraud be clearly shown to exist to such an extent as to satisfy the mind that the return does not show the truth, and no evidence is furnished by either party to a contest, and no investigation of the committee enable them to deduce the truth therefrom, then no alternative is left but to reject such a return. To use it under such a state of facts is to use as true what is shown to be false.

Yet this House is asked, in the first place, to take a poll that is so polluted by fraud and corruption that you cannot determine what the actual vote was; and you are asked to count that; and yet you are asked to reject the poll in the next precinct, where there is no evidence showing fraud or corruption on the part of the commissioners or any one else. "Consistency, thou art a jewel!" I feel warranted in saying that, taking this evidence and carefully scanning it, the House cannot, without violence to every rule of law on this subject, reject this precinct.

As to the Norwood Park precinct and the pauper vote, my time will not allow me to go into it to any extent. The position I take in regard to paupers is this: It is clearly established, as the evidence will show, these men were sent to the poor-house by the board of charity. It will clearly appear from the testimony that these men were paupers coming from other districts. The law of Illinois declares that no one shall be a voter in any precinct unless he has a permanent abode—not domicile, not residence, but a permanent abode. The supreme court (41 Illinois) decided that a pauper can neither gain nor lose a residence while in a poor-house, and that the town from which he is sent must support him as a resident of that town or precinct. Yet they allowed sixty of these paupers to vote in Norwood Park, and the majority of the committee insist, notwithstanding the ruling of this House in the case of Covode vs. Foster, that this pauper vote shall be counted.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss any of the questions which arise in the eighteenth or twentieth wards of Chicago. I tried my hand upon a similar question the other day, in the case of Finley vs. Walls, and I said in my argument on that occasion that I hoped my friends of the majority, who were for "casting out the nines" on that occasion, would be equally ready to cast out the nines on a future occasion. Whether I had that hope really in my heart or not is between me and my conscience, but I expressed in a parliamentary way the hope that, on some future occasion when the casting out of a precinct would work precisely the opposite result from what it was likely to operate in the case of casting out the colored academy precinct, my friends on the other side would be as ready to cast out as they were on that occasion. And perhaps it is not inadvisable to mention the fact that, if you did in Walls's case what is sought to be done by the contestant here, to purge the poll, reject every vote there could be a word of quarrel about, then Walls would be elected and FINLEY left out in the cold and therefore it would not do to purge. No purging then! No purgative roots could be administered then! [Laughter.] But on this occasion when purging will produce a different result on the health of the patient, purging is the remedy, and bleeding, too, perhaps. [Laughter.] But purging is all that is recommended.

I will not discuss that question further than to say I have an opportunity here to see how much my friends on the other side of the House are really attached to this system of casting out a precinct where frauds have been perpetrated.

I rise principally to talk about the Norwood Park matter. Norwood Park is a little town in Cook County, outside of the city of Chicago. Norwood Park has of its residents eighty-four voters, on all sides of politics. But Norwood Park was honored by Chicago with the location of the poor-house of Cook County, so that the paupers (if I understand it correctly) from my friend CAULFIELD'S district, and from my friend HARRISON'S district, as well as from Farwell's district, are all sent to hibernate at Norwood Park. And accordingly if the poor-house votes, Norwood Park is a pretty large town, but if the poor-house does not vote Norwood Park has 84 votes.

But the poor-house is located there. They have a superintendent of the poor-house, and that superintendent of the poor-house is none of your mean-spirited fellows. He is a high-toned constitutional democrat, clear up, and you will see he is. [Laughter.] He is as high-toned as any of these fellows whose rascalities are sought to be charged over to Farwell in the eighteenth and twentieth wards of Chicago. Every individual of them a democrat of the first water—no, not water, for they were democrats, but every individual of them a democrat of the purest spirits, [laughter,] the whole of them, every man of them! Well, this man comes to the polls and brings down his poor-house van, and every man whose vote is questioned here comes down to the polls, riding in the poor-house van. He comes there with power and consideration which must commend him to the men who want fair play in elections, and he tells them how it shall be, and how it shall not be. One of the witnesses, Mr. Pennoyer, an humble countryman living out of the city, said in answer to a question asked whether this man Kimberly made any threats if this poor-house vote was not received:

> Well, he did make threats; said he would put the judges through if they were not received, and told me that I would not occupy that position another year, and that he would follow me to hell.

[Laughter.]

Can any man doubt his democracy? [Renewed laughter.] Because I want to satisfy my friends on the other side. [Laughter.] Whether he followed Pennoyer there or not, the inference is that he probably traveled that road.

Mr. Bell is sworn as a witness, and he says that Kimberly remarked that "the judges were damned scoundrels, and if the votes were not received he would be damned if he did not prosecute them; that was his language."

You see these men not only came in the poor-house van, but they came with power. They came with a man who acted as one having authority, and not as a scribe.

Now, it is said these men were not paupers. Not paupers! Why were they in the poor-house van?

That is not all. Four men testified that in this township of 84 votes they had lived there year after year and had never seen the faces of one of these men; that they knew nothing of them until they appeared there to vote. How could that happen?

But a case was made on the part of Farweil that induced Le Moyne to put this man Kimberly on the stand. What did Kimberly swear? and he knew if anybody. He said that he presumed that these men came to the poor-house on the certificate of Chicago physicians.

In the cross-examination it was attempted to be made out that these men were working for pay. These fellows were in better health than many. Here was the poor-house with nearly two thousand people. These voters were the dii selecti from that great heathen temple. These were the few men that could come and vote, and they were on the "pay-list." I do not mean to disparage the men because they were in the poor-house. A good man may go into the poor-house. Two of these men even voted for Farwell, indicating that there was some conscience and some feeling even in the poor-house. [Laughter.] I do not mean to disparage them at all. But these were men that came there under the certificate of physicians of Chicago from the Caulfield district, from the Harrison district, as well as from the Farwell district. But "they were paid." Ah, paid! Yes; these men were under pay. But what was their pay? The board of charities that had control of the poor-house had authorized Kimberly if men were able to work they might have extra food. That was the word, "extra." What is extra? They were to have extra food, extra clothing, extra accommodation. What is extra? Extra is over and above something. Over and above what? Over and above what the other paupers had. Men that worked as carpenters—as three or four did—men that worked as masons did not have extra pay. They had pay. But these men had extra pay and extra clothing; some of them were allowed even to dine in the hospital because they could work. They were allowed—ah! a strong element of democracy, one of the props of the Constitution and of "the principles of '98"—they were allowed tobacco. And every man knows that if you sustain the principles of 1798 you have got to do it with corn-whisky and plug-tobacco. [Laughter.] They had one of these bribes furnished them. They had tobacco. These were the extras and this was the pay these men had.

No, sir; it is the veriest nonsense that was ever put forward in the world to talk about these men, paid or not, being other than paupers in the almshouse, to which, in the language of Kimberly himself, they had been sent upon the certificate of physicians from Chicago. These were the men that came to overvote and control the town of Norwood Park. Now, if they were lawful voters that was all right. But I put it to the House whether the town of Norwood Park can be believed to have bargained, when they allowed the poor-house to be constructed there, to have the paupers in the poor-house, led by the superintendent, a democrat this year and a republican next year, vote down and control the residents of the town? I put it to the House to know if that is the opinion of any man that God has made? They never bargained for it. They never so understood; and no other place ever bargained for such a thing.

I do not see here my colleague on the committee from Massachusetts, [Mr. THOMPSON.] I came originally from Massachusetts, and I have a great regard for Massachusetts. Massachusetts has, I think, in the town of Palmer, a poor-house—an almshouse for her State paupers for the whole State. Did that township bargain when the poor-house was located there to have these men outvote and control the town or even the county in which they were located?

But, again, if these men become residents by being in the poor-house, what will be the result? I do not know how the laws are in Illinois. I know how the laws are in my State; I know how the laws are in nearly all the Northeastern States, or perhaps in every one of them. We have local or town poor, county poor, or State poor, as the case may be, in the several States. And if men acquire residence by being located in the poor-house the entire riffraff of Chicago would, after a year's time, be chargeable and the expense of supporting them would be chargeable to Norwood Park. That is the result. It is inevitable; and I do not care how men bluster. I do not care how men reason, it cannot be avoided; the result is necessary. If men acquire residence by being supported as paupers in the poor-house, then the locality in which the poor-house is situated becomes under obligation in every State where there is the difference between State and local poor to support the entire poor population of the locality from which these men come.

Now I have one thing more to say, and that is in regard to the law of the State of Illinois. The law of the State of Illinois has provided that a man shall be for a specified time a resident of the locality where he proposes to vote. And the men that made the law were aware of the difficulties that arise in the interpretation of the laws of residence. They understood perfectly well that at times this House in former days has been convulsed to its center over allegations that students attending college for four years or less claimed thereby to have acquired a residence and the right to vote and by their votes to control the legal voters of the place where they got their education. The State of Illinois, knowing this and meaning to provide for such a contingency, has made an addition to the law, requiring that voters shall be residents. And they define what they mean by residence. They say that residence, as the term is used in the section, must be a permanent residence. That is the language of the law—a permanent residence.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. "A permanent abode."

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Now were these paupers permanent residents of Norwood Park? How were they residents? Had they a house that they rented? Had they a house that they owned? Had they a room that they rented? Had they a room that they could control? Had they a spot or thing in Norwood Park that they could control for an instant of time? They were no more residents of Norwood Park than the impotent man lying at the Pool of Bethesda was a resident there; lying there impotent and waiting for the angel to descend and trouble the waters to the end that some other man might take him and put him into the pool. There is no case in the books showing that he ever claimed a title to either of the five porches. There is no account in the books that he even set up any claim that he had a right to vote in that ward of Jerusalem where the Pool of Bethesda was, or even at Gehenna, although that precinct was much nearer to Bethesda than Norwood Park to Chicago. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, they tell us about the soothsayers of ancient Rome being unable to look each other in the face without laughing, and my friends of the majority of the committee must be in the same situation. No two of them out of sight of this House and the grave responsibilities that we are under here could fail to chuckle and laugh when they looked each other in the face to think that they have to argue that because these old paupers are allowed extra clothing and tobacco, and some of them are allowed to dine in the hospital for doing a little work, they are permanent residents in the town of Norwood Park.

Mr. Speaker, I did not intend when I rose to talk so much about this matter. I tell you, sir, that the man who, in view of the facts in this case, will not adopt the results of common sense is in the situation of those for whom a celebrated individual prayed that one might be sent from the other world to give them information. It was said of them that if they would not believe Moses and the prophets they would not believe though one rose from the dead. I need not talk longer about Norwood Park. I yield the residue of my time to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT.]

Mr. HURLBUT. I have been advised by those who are older and more experienced than I am, that it is useless to argue an election case against the expressed will of the majority of the committee. I do not propose, sir, to accept that prohibition, because I consider that if there be any question upon which the members of this House should act fairly and dispassionately, it is upon one that relates to the right of a member elected by the people to his place here. It is one of the few questions upon which this House is called to pass judicially and upon honor.

In arguing this case I shall endeavor to present to the House the considerations which govern my vote and the reasoning on which I sustain them, and I hope that they may receive equally fair and unbiased consideration from others.

Now, sir, as I understand it, this House is called upon to override local government, home rule, the established laws of the State of Illinois. They are called upon, as I understand the evidence, to reverse the verdict of the people, rendered in the discharge of their highest capacity, upon reasons which it is my duty to show to this House are insufficient. And first I desire to strike out from this case altogether whatever may have been admitted into it of prejudice or political partisanship.

I regret that the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS,] who opened this debate, is not here, because I shall be called upon on this occasion to show that the allegations which he made, as I understood him, are unfounded in fact and were intended only to arouse prejudice.

In the first place, sir, this does not happen to be a political contest at all. It is in the proof that Mr. Le Moyne is not a democrat, and never was, and never was heard of as such. There are a great many things in this proof, and among other things somebody proceeded to give the political history of the contestant. It is shown by the testimony of several very eminent persons that he was a leader in olden times and until a very late period of what was known as the far-advanced wing of the whig party, which favored abolitionism, which preceded even the formation of the republican party; and in the next place it is not true that these officers of election there were democrats, or that the democrats had any charge at that time of the city of Chicago or the county of Cook. It is also in evidence that a very bad and corrupt organization known as the "peoples party," which as every man knows, like all the miscellaneous parties which grow up between the two great parties, gather together all the camp followers and political traders who cannot get offices fast enough in the regular parties, and under some sham pretense of reform sweep respectable persons into their party. That organization in 1873 took possession of the city of Chicago and the county of Cook, and had the appointment of all these officers whose conduct has been shown here to be so derelict to duty; and neither of the great parties of the country has any responsibility for the rascalities committed by these officers. Mr. Leib, whose conduct has been detailed to you here, was one of the free lances, the privateers, who wander around wherever they think there is most food to be obtained. Even those judges of election who disgraced the office of judge in the first precinct of the twentieth ward are of this class of canting reformers whose sole unity of action depends upon what they may steal from a confiding public. I state these things in answer to what the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] said in his opening. He sent up to be read at the Clerk's desk some very cheap and common law; that no man could take advantage of his own fraud. Well, everybody knows that; it is as old as the world. But there is another principle of law about fraud that is just as old; that fraud cannot be presumed of a principal for the act of an agent, that the principal is not responsible until you show that the fraud of the agent was an act of the principal.

Now, there are two things, and only two things, in this proof that I care to speak of. The one is the manner in which the election laws of my State were utterly overruled and made of no effect in the first precinct of the twentieth ward of Chicago; and the second is the conclusion which, in my judgment, this Committee of Elections and this House should have drawn from that consideration. My friend who opened this debate stated with substantial accuracy the laws of Illinois with regard to elections. Our registry and election law in the State of Illinois is such that, when the question arises, it is not difficult to ascertain precisely how the vote was cast. If the law is violated, the fact of the violation must of necessity appear among the records of the election itself.

For example, according to the law of Illinois, a number is placed opposite the name of each voter on the poll-list; and when he hands in his ballot that number so opposite his name on the poll-list is indorsed upon the ballot, which of course is not opened, but is put into the ballot-box. If the number on the poll-list should be 100, then the number 100 is indorsed upon the ballot before it is deposited in the box. Of course when a judicial investigation takes place, if that business has been fairly done you can open the ballots, ascertain each man's name, and find out exactly how every legal voter in the precinct did vote. At the same time, if it should so happen that the judges of election should do what they appear undeniably to have done here—that is, stuff the ballot-boxes—then there would appear, as there did appear in this case, necessarily the most convincing evidence of fraud in the fact that half a dozen or more ballots would bear the same number and that there would be ballots marked above the entire number of voters as recorded on the poll-list.

Now, the gentlemen who have preceded me have demonstrated to this House that nowhere in the history of any election, in any State, has there been anything so bad, so gross, so absolutely fraudulent in every respect as the conduct of the judges of election in the first precinct of the twentieth ward; so utterly bad that there is no paper which they could introduce but what is tainted throughout with fraud. And the very papers they are compelled to produce, and do produce, before the Committee of Elections show how that fraud was carried out.

Now, in that condition of affairs, what is the clear rule of law? And law is nothing but high reason. The rule is that whenever it appears conclusively that no further confidence can be reposed in the papers themselves you must throw them all away. And that seems to be what this committee at first did. I call the attention of the House to the fact that this contestant, in his original notice and for the whole of the first forty days that are given him by law for the purpose of taking testimony so far as regards this first precinct of this twentieth ward, devoted his whole time and attention to showing the absolutely fraudulent nature of the election there, and insisted that the returns from that precinct should be thrown out, and undoubtedly that was the correct thing to do.

Now after that is established, after the vote is thrown out, what else is there left to do? Only one thing. That thing is to call up the men who are known to be voters there and ascertain how they did vote. And just so far as Mr. Le Moyne went in doing that thing, after having established the fraud of the managers of election, so far those votes proven count either for him or for Mr. Farwell; and after having spent the forty days which are given him by the law for the purpose of destroying the validity of the entire return, he cannot afterward, in the ten days which the law gives him merely for rebuttal and when the opposite party is not permitted to be heard, go into evidence as to the character of the voters in the precinct.

Now, in either of these two events, if you throw out the whole of that precinct, or if you admit the votes that were proved in the original forty days, which is all any man under the law has a right to claim, still Mr. Le Moyne does not make out a case without bringing in the question of the pauper votes of Norwood Park precinct. I come now to the Norwood Park vote.

I wish in the first place to call the attention of the House to the common-law definition of residence. By the mere force of the term, residence implies two things; one is that the man has the right to make and does make a choice; choice is one thing implied in residence. The other thing is that he has an intention to remain where he has made that choice. These two things enter into the common-law definition of residence; and without these two things there can be no residence.

A person who has no right to make a choice of residence never can acquire a residence. A person who is sent to a place involuntarily cannot claim that he has ever exercised will, intelligence, or choice in going there. A person who has no right to determine for himself how long he shall stay in any place cannot possess the other requisite of residence, the intention of remaining. I take it these two things are clear.

There has been a great deal said here with regard to the laws of the State of Illinois that probably it is not worth while for me to answer. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS,] who opened this debate, for some unknown reason introduced here the law of the State of Illinois which requires able-bodied children to support their parents. I do not know what reference that law has to this case. In so doing, the law of Illinois simply enacted the law of God and of humanity.

But the State of Illinois has declared for herself what residence is, and that declaration made by that State is binding upon this House and upon every one else. You must remember that the right to elect members of this House depends upon the qualifications which the State thinks proper to impose upon voters, upon electors for the most numerous branch of her Legislature. The State establishes those qualifications, under the Constitution of the United States of course, and that establishment is binding upon the question, and this tribunal has no right to set it aside.

Now the constitution of Illinois provides that "every person having resided in this State one year, in the county ninety days, and in the election districts thirty days next preceding any election therein shall be a voter;" provided, of course, that he is not disqualified for crime. In other words, in the State of Illinois poverty alone does not disqualify a man from voting. He may be as poor as the veriest mendicant that ever begged, still he loses no right of his humanity. There are States in this Union which, perhaps from high considerations of public morals, have forbidden to a person who does not pay taxes, or who is in fact a pauper, the right to vote. I can understand the reasons why such a provision might be adopted; and I can show you why in our State the provision of law which we have adopted is a wise one. When a man becomes a pauper and is supported at the public expense he loses a large part of his individuality; he is subject to the orders of others; he can be trooped down to vote just as this man Kimberly dragged down these sixty-seven voters in an ambulance belonging to the county poor-house, and as the proof shows put their votes in for them. They were subject in all respects to his tender mercies; and it would be a little difficult to say that they were competent voters, such voters as ought to cast a ballot. But they were voters under the law of the State of Illinois, if they possessed the other qualification; that is, if they were residents in the township of Norwood Park. In other words, the limitations imposed by the constitution and laws of Illinois is that a man must have a permanent known residence of at least thirty days in the township where he votes.

Now look at this case. Here is a little township out in Cook County with only eighty-four voters—probably not four hundred inhabitants. Yonder is a great city twelve miles off, a perfect maelstrom of human life, where great ships have gone down, where there are wrecks innumerable, so that many of these poorer craft, crippled and wrecked, unable to swim in that tide, drift off into this last resort of extreme necessity. Now in no sense of the word are those men voluntary agents in coming there. As the proof in this case shows, they are sent there by the board of charities of the city of Chicago. They are there at the public expense; they are not there voluntarily; they have no control over the question how long they are to remain there or when they may be turned out. There is nothing of permanence or of choice about their staying in that neighborhood. In this state of affairs, is it to be pretended that they acquire under the constitution and laws of the State a power which authorizes them to control every election in that little township? That portion of the State of Illinois, and in fact nearly the whole of it, is under township organization. The roads, the bridges, the town taxes, the local expenses of each township, are governed by their voters. If these men were voters at that election, they must be voters at any township election; and under the law as contended for here—which never can be the law in Illinois; it may be the law here, but it will never be anywhere else—those men could control the entire expenses, the election of the officers, and everything connected with the government of that township. That is a proposition which seems to me on its face atrocious. If these men were not in good faith and by their own choice permanent residents of that township of Norwood Park, then Mr. Le Moyne cannot maintain his claim to a seat in this House. That is the question upon which the House is to pass; and I want it to be decided upon the facts as they appear. It is an atrocity to assume that any House will override the clear known law of the State, that it will make those men voters who the State has said shall not be voters. The House is called upon in this case to strike a direct blow at that foundation doctrine of "home rule" which I have heard talked of so much by members of the democratic party.

Now, on that point allow me to call attention to the evidence. I will read simply the testimony of this man Kimberly, the captain of the host that led these people down there to vote for Mr. Le Moyne. He is asked this question:

Question. Do the names of these men appear on any pay-roll?
Answer. No, sir.
Q. What compensation do they get, then, if any?
A. Extra board, accommodations, clothing, and are allowed small perquisites, liberty—

The idea of allowing "liberty" to a voter—liberty, and the men in charge of the wash-house I allow the privilege of selling tobacco and cigars.

The truth of the matter is simply this, as the clear, unbroken mass of testimony in the case shows: these men were simply paupers, sent there by the board of charities of the city of Chicago; they had never previously been residents of Norwood Park; nobody knows where they came from, whether from the city proper or from the surrounding towns, or whether they were mere vagrants who had wandered into that great city. The sole ground of the pretense that they had any rights at all as voters is the fact that if they behaved themselves they received little perquisites, extra "liberty," extra clothing, the right to sell tobacco, &c. They were a sort of non-commissioned officers in this brigade of dismantled and broken-down men.

Now, if in the face of these facts, which appear to me undeniable, this House should conclude to so construe the laws of Illinois as to say that these men, who never had any choice as to their going to that township, who were sent there whether they wanted to go or not, who had no choice about remaining there, who either remained or were sent away at the will of another—if the House believes that these men acquired any permanent domicile or residence there, it has the right to unseat Mr. Farwell.

Negative testimony in this case is nearly all that can be given. In that little township six miles square with eighty-four voters they bring to you eight men who have lived there from six to twenty years who state that they know every resident in that town, and that these men, until they came down there at the election, were never known in any capacity in that town. How are you going to get over that class of testimony?

Now, if I desired a mere political advantage in a case of this kind, I would prefer, knowing the sentiments of our people, that this House should overthrow the clear law of Illinois and send this matter back to the people, because among those residing there who know the law of our State it would be considered a great outrage upon the right of self-government, and would redound against the party or the men who should make any such rule.

But I hope this House is going to pass upon it from a different consideration; that it is going to measure the rights of these parties to hold a seat here according to the evidence and law; that it is going to determine, if it can arrive at the sense of the people, the real people who did vote and give it validity and effect. If this House shall do so, then I have no question as to what the result will be.

It is not my intention to prolong this debate at this time, nor do I desire to occupy any more time than simply, clearly, and plainly to state to the House the general principles which are involved in this question, and they are the two which I have stated. The clearly-established rule of law is that wherever the ballots and other evidence of election are utterly tainted and bad they shall be thrown out. That was the course this House took in the case of Finley vs. Walls. It is the course taken everywhere when you undertake to purge a poll. But fair opportunity should be given to the doctrine contended for here, that without any evidence under the sun of the liability of the contestee here for these frauds they shall not be charged against him. Because a man by the name of Corcoran was running as alderman, and who probably stuffed this ballot-box in his own interest, because that was done they shall charge without authority, without law, and without evidence the whole of these illegal votes upon the contestee is a proposition so outrageous that I have no idea this House will entertain it for a single moment.

These things, gentlemen, I thought it advisable to say in relation merely to this contest, as viewed from our own laws and the clearly-expressed decisions of our own courts. If it were necessary I could reread decisions of our own supreme court of Illinois in which, although not speaking on contested-election cases at all, it lays down and supports the broad proposition that no person, not a resident of the town prior to the time of his going into the poor-house, can obtain a legal residence there. That is the law. If any one of these men was a resident of Norwood Park at the time he became a public charge he would still retain, under our law, the right to vote in that town. If, however, these men were transferred, as the proof shows they were, from somewhere else, from other townships to this poor-house, they do not acquire under the law of Illinois residence in the town of Norwood Park, where this poor-house is situated.

There are two ways in which our poor are maintained in the State of Illinois, varying of course in different counties. In some counties the poor are maintained by the town out of the town fund. Those who were residents of the town before they became a charge upon the township fund still retain their voting capacity, but in case they are supported by the county at a single house, if you gather men from eight, ten, or twenty towns of which a county may be composed, the men from the nineteen towns in which the poor-house is not situated do not acquire any right to vote in the one township where the poor-house is situated. They can go back to their own place, of course, and vote, but not elsewhere.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, there are two questions presented in the evidence and in the discussion of members who have addressed the House. The one relates to the vote in the first precinct of the twentieth ward. If that shall be excluded, the sitting member is elected, unless the vote of the paupers in the Norwood Park poor-house is counted.

I do not intend to discuss, in the few moments I shall ask the attention of the House this evening, the vote in regard to the first precinct of the twentieth ward in the city of Chicago. We have a report here, concurred in by a majority of the committee, that the proper method of treating the vote of the first precinct of the twentieth ward is to exclude it. The republican members of that committee and two democratic members of the committee concurred in that opinion. Only five members of the committee favor a different rule from that followed at this session in the case of Finley vs. Walls. Two members of the committee properly dissent from this conclusion of their political associates and say:

We cannot concur in that portion of the report which seeks to purge the poll at precinct No. 1 in twentieth ward of Chicago. The conduct of the officers of election having been shown to be grossly fraudulent, and the integrity of their returns at this poll having been thereby destroyed, and the proof having shown also that the ballots in the box had been tampered with, we can come to no other conclusion than to reject the entire vote at this precinct, except in so far as contestant and contestee have established by proof aliunde the number of votes they received at this poll respectively.

JNO. F. HOUSE.
CHARLES P. THOMPSON.

A majority of the committee, therefore, concur in the exclusion of that poll. Their view is in accord with the action of the House but a few days since.

Therefore, unless the vote of the paupers of Norwood Park should be counted, the sitting member is entitled to his seat. The disposition of the pauper vote in Norwood Park depends upon the meaning of the word "resided" as used in the laws and constitution of the State of Illinois. It is not claimed that paupers have no right to vote, but it is claimed that the law and constitution of Illinois upon this question are in perfect accord with the decisions of this House in former contested-election cases. They are also in harmony with the rule approved by the standard authorities on elections as the proper rule to be followed in cases of this kind.

In the case of Covode vs. Foster the House held that paupers could not and did not gain a residence by virtue of location in a poor-house in a particular town. That decision is commended by McCrary in his valuable treatise on elections as a proper rule to be followed in the decision of contested-election cases.

Is the law different in the State of Illinois? A case has been referred to, the scope and meaning of which I perhaps can, with some confidence, discuss, because I was one of the counsel engaged in trying it in the court below and afterward argued it with others in the supreme court. I refer to the case of Freeport vs. Stephenson County, in 41 Illinois Reports. Before I discuss that decision, I wish to call the attention of the House to the similarity of language in the law relating to paupers and that used in the constitution and statutes of Illinois in regard to residence for the purpose of voting.

The language of the constitution, which is correctly quoted in the majority report, is that every person having resided in the State for a certain length of time shall be entitled to vote; and the law requires the challenged voter to swear that he has so resided. In 1861, I think it was, the Legislature changed the liability as far as the county of Stephenson was concerned, for the support of the paupers in that county. The language used was that—

Each town in the county of Stephenson, from and after the annual meeting of the board of supervisors of said county, shall respectively pay the expenses of the support of the paupers residing in each town.

There were four paupers residing in the town of Freeport for whose support the town of Freeport contended it was not liable. An action was brought against the town, and when the case was carried to the supreme court a stipulation was made; and this was the stipulation:

That at the time said persons and each of them became paupers and were sent to said poor-house, they and each of them were legal residents of said town of Freeport.

The Supreme Court in passing upon this say—

It is conceded they were residents of the county, and it is expressly agreed that at the time they severally became paupers they were legal residents of the town of Freeport. Then did they—

That is the question which the Supreme Court announces to be passed upon—did they, by being sent to the poor-house, lose their residence in that town and become residents of the town of Silver Creek, in which the county poor-house was situated?

Did they lose their residence? A term used everywhere in our laws and Constitution, and having a fixed meaning as interpreted by the courts. Now in discussing that the Supreme Court say—

As a general rule—

Not applying to paupers alone, but applying to all cases—

persons under legal disability or restraint, persons of non-sane memory, or persons in want of freedom, are incapable of losing or gaining a residence by acts performed by them under the control of others. A person imprisoned under operation of law does not thereby change his residence. So of a lunatic legally confined in an asylum. As these acts are involuntary, there can be no presumption of the necessary intent to change the residence. So of femes-coverts and minors. And no reason is perceived why the maintenance of a pauper at the poor-house should form an exception to the rule. He is placed there by the officers of the law and in pursuance of its requirements.

The House will perceive that a general rule is here announced, and that the decision is based upon that well-known rule of law to which it is held the pauper is no exception. Now in this discussion has any authority, any decision of any court, been brought to show that that is not the rule of law in regard to residence under our election laws? Not at all. But here we have the decisions of the courts confirming the decision of the House, and sustained by authority.

Mr. MILLS. Does it appear that these paupers were not residents of the district in which they voted?

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. It does appear. I cannot now refer to the testimony, because I have not the references here, but I have examined it, and I refer the gentleman to the remarks of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. BROWN,] who points out in detail that these were not residents, the fact being testified to by men who have lived there in the town and knew the residents. It was a small town, and in one of our little towns of eighty or one hundred votes, as Norwood Park was, or even containing two hundred or three hundred voters, every man knows his neighbors, and knows who are voters and who are not. I have found it so. It is not so in the cities.

Possibly this case was confused in the minds of some gentlemen by the citation and discussion of the law of our State requiring relatives to contribute to the support of the poor. That law gives no control to anybody, to any relative. He is free to go or stay, and the law merely imposes a liability when the pauper becomes a county charge, or as in the case of Stephenson County and a few other counties, a town charge; the control of the pauper is placed in the hands of the officers of the town or county, and they have a right to contract with persons who shall support them; and the county authorities can say where the man shall go, can put him in this town or that town or anywhere it chooses. I will refer gentlemen to sections 5, 6, 8, 10, and 21 of our law. In the case where there is a county poor-house the law is only changed in taking away the authority from overseers and retaining it in the board, but giving the board the right, if there be any particular case or cases which the board should deem prudent to put out under the provisions of this chapter, to do so, making a proper entry of the circumstances upon their records. They can put the pauper in the poor-house, or they can contract with individuals to support him in different parts of the county or State. To show that the law treats them as under control I quote section 10, which says:

The county commissioners' court may at any regular term of said court remove any poor person from the custody—of the person or persons to whose care the overseers may have committed his keeping.

And he is to give a bond to provide for them and take care of them. Then here is an express decision of the Supreme Court that as a general rule, and it is a sensible rule, a common-sense rule, recognized by the courts everywhere in regard to residence, a person under control or custody of another, as these are placed by our law, cannot gain a residence; and that in the case of the pauper there is no exception from this general rule that applies to everybody.

And yet they say that that decision is not a case in point. Why, sir, we relied upon this general rule. In our brief we referred to this general rule as being the law, and insisted (and the court held) that this was no exception. The court sustained us, basing its decision, as we based our argument, upon a general rule which it said applied to paupers as well as to others under legal control in regard to their residence.

It has been argued that the pauper is an exception so far as gaining a residence for voting, though not as to his residence for support. The general rule, it is said, does not apply to gaining a voting residence, even when the pauper is sent to the county poor-house by the authorities, as he must be to gain admission. No decision of any court is cited to sustain the argument. None can be found.

Throwing out the vote of the first precinct of the twentieth ward, which a majority of the committee agree, after carefully examining the testimony and fairly applying the law to the case, should be excluded, and rejecting the 60 pauper votes of Norwood Park proved to be non-residents in the county poor-house, the sitting member appears by the testimony and from both reports to have received a majority of the votes in the congressional district, and is entitled to his seat.

Mr. BLACKBURN obtained the floor.

Mr. POPPLETON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to make a motion.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. POPPLETON. I desire to announce that after the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] shall have spoken I shall move the previous question and ask a vote. I now move that the House adjourn.

ISSUE OF SILVER COIN.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on Banking and Currency upon a resolution that was referred to it yesterday in regard to the issue of silver coin.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Banking and Currency, to whom was referred House resolution No. 109, report the same back with the following amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the resolution with the amendments in it as reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury, under such limits and regulations as will best secure a just and fair distribution of the same through the country, may issue the silver coin now in the Treasury to an amount not exceeding $10,000,000 exchanged for an equal amount of legal-tender notes, and the notes so received in exchange shall be re-issued only upon the retirement and destruction of a like sum of fractional currency received at the Treasury in payment of dues to the United States, and said fractional currency when so substituted shall be destroyed and held as part of the sinking fund, as provided in the act approved April 17, 1876.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to reserve the point of order upon that joint resolution until it has been read as it was offered, so that we may see what the amendments are.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the resolution as originally offered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury, under such limits and regulations as will best secure a just and fair distribution of the same through the country, may issue the silver coin now in the Treasury in redemption of an equal amount of legal-tender notes, and the notes so redeemed shall be re-issued only upon the retirement of a like sum of fractional currency, and said fractional currency when so substituted shall be destroyed and held as part of the sinking fund, as provided in the act approved April 17, 1876.

Mr. HOLMAN. Without withdrawing the objection, I trust the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] will, if the joint resolution comes before the House, allow a motion to be made to strike out that portion of it which provides that the legal-tender notes shall not be issued until a corresponding amount of fractional currency shall have been canceled.

Mr. PAYNE. I think a brief explanation will remove any objection to the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is it understood that there is any objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the right to object until the explanation is made.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will any gentleman be at liberty to object after the explanation?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The objection is reserved until the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] shall have explained the joint resolution. That is understood.

Mr. PAYNE. The difficulty in the way of the Treasurer in putting in circulation the silver coin now on hand, amounting to some $14,000,000, is that a sort of panic has arisen and the fractional currency is commanding a premium of from 3 to 3½ per cent. in different parts of the country. The process is so slow of exchanging the fractional paper for coin that the supply is not sufficiently rapid to meet the demands of business all over the country.

Now, with a view of expediting the distribution of this silver coin more rapidly than it can be accomplished now, it is proposed that an amount not exceeding $10,000,000 of the silver coin in the Treasury may be exchanged for legal-tender notes under such rules as will secure a fair and just distribution throughout the various parts of the country, and that these legal-tender notes thus deposited with the Treasurer for silver coin shall be retained as a specific fund for the redemption of a like amount of fractional notes as they may come into the Treasury in the course of business. That is the whole purport of the resolution. It was drawn in accordance with the suggestions of the Treasurer of the United States to meet this exigency and it is proposed that it shall continue until the whole amount of legal-tender notes thus deposited as security for silver coin shall have been redeemed by bringing into the Treasury an equal amount of fractional notes, and those fractional notes are to be retired and canceled, at which time the legal-tender notes will be paid to whoever is entitled to them.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio who reports this joint resolution whether he regards the provision in the resolution for keeping the $10,000,000 as a specific fund, as he himself has stated it, to be sufficient to accomplish that object? I see that they are not to be re-issued until the fractional currency is destroyed. Is there anything to prevent this $10,000,000 of legal-tenders from going into the general fund of the Treasury in the same way that the legal-tender notes now deposited for redeeming the national-bank circulation go into and form part of the common fund, not to be paid out again, as I think the law requires, but which in fact are paid out for the purposes of the Government? Can this $10,000,000 of legal-tenders be used to defray the ordinary expenses of the Government, or will it be put in a fund by itself and not a dollar of it be touched except for the purpose of retiring and canceling so much fractional currency? It seems to me that this joint resolution is not specific enough on that point.

Mr. PAYNE. That is a very long question.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. That may be; but I only wanted to make myself understood.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] is occupying the floor.

Mr. PAYNE. In answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] I beg to say that this joint resolution provides that this $10,000,000 of legal-tender notes shall not be re-issued except upon the retirement of an equal amount of fractional currency. It does not provide that the Secretary of the Treasury or the Treasurer of the United States shall not commit a breach of trust, or a penitentiary offense. It merely provides that he shall not re-issue these legal-tender notes until a like amount of fractional currency is retired and destroyed. It did not occur to the committee that it was necessary to make any further provision against a breach of duty on the part of an officer of the Government. The joint resolution does clearly provide that $10,000,000 of silver coin may be exchanged for an equal amount of legal-tender notes, and that those legal-tender notes shall be re-issued whenever a like amount of fractional currency is brought into the Treasury and canceled and destroyed.

It is intended to provide an immediate accommodation to the public; a relief from an imposition now practiced, perhaps necessarily arising from the deficient amount of fractional currency in the country. It proposes to relieve the people of the country to the extent of at once giving them $10,000,000 of silver change. That is all there is of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this joint resolution at this time? It cannot be entertained except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLOUNT. I object.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] will withdraw his objection.

Mr. BLOUNT. I insist upon my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made, and the joint resolution is not before the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order being called for, the question before the House is the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POPPLETON] that the House now adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before the question is taken on the motion to adjourn, I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POPPLETON] when it is understood the vote will be taken upon the pending resolutions in the contested-election case?

Mr. POPPLETON. To-morrow, immediately after the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] I shall move the previous questions and call for a vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. So that there will be one hour of debate on the resolutions to-morrow?

Mr. POPPLETON. One hour only.

WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. EDEN, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on War Claims a bill (H. R. No. 3359) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871; which was read a first and second time, recommitted, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. FREEMAN for three days.

EXCUSED FROM COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] desires to be excused from service on the special committee to investigate the conduct of Federal officials in New Orleans.

There being no objection, Mr. FOSTER was excused.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. POPPLETON that the House adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois: The petition of citizens of Carroll County, Illinois, for the repeal of the resumption act, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Also, the petition of Francis A. Anderson, heir of Dr. Gustavus B. Horner, relative to the petition heretofore filed by the heirs of said Horner for bounty land or other compensation for services rendered by him during the revolutionary war, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

By Mr. CAULFIELD: The petition of Hermon J. Korff, for additional compensation as a lieutenant-colonel United States Army, and for pay for horse and equipments lost at the battle of Richmond, Kentucky, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. GOODIN: Concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, memorializing Congress to pay losses sustained by citizens of that State by the invasion of bands of guerrillas and marauders during the years 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865, to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. HARDENBERGH: Remonstrance of Thomas R. Bennett, Edward D. Lawson, W. F. Smith, and Charles A. King, a committee from 300 plate printers, remonstrating against the practices of members of the Plate Printers' Union employed in the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. HEWITT, of New York: The petition of merchants, traders, and other citizens of New York, that no duties be imposed on raw materials which enter largely into manufactures, that all duties should be specific and not ad valorem, and that all classifications should be simple and distinct, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. HOPKINS: The petition of soldiers of the late war and other citizens of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, that a pension be paid to Andrew Jackson, colored, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HUNTON: The petition of Mary Chichester, for compensation for her house and contents destroyed by fire immediately after its evacuation by General Geary, United States Army, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. McDILL: The petition of Ellen W. Hardwick, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MEADE: The petition of liquor dealers of New York, for the definition of the powers and duties of officers of the internal revenue and to further provide for the collection of the tax on distilled spirits, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. MUTCHLER: Remonstrance of citizens of Easton, Pennsylvania, against abolishing the free-delivery system by the Post-Office Department, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana: Resolutions adopted at a mass meeting held at Indianapolis, Indiana, asking for the release of Edward O'M. Condon, confined in a British prison, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. LYNCH: Papers relating to the claim of L. Levy, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania: A paper relative to the granting of Mary Lavelette a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WIGGINTON: The petition of Mrs. A. Hawkkins and 250 others, for a resurvey of the Rancho Rio de Santa Clara, in California, o the Committee on Public Lands.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 3, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a special estimate, submitted by the Quartermaster-General, for an appropriation for the present and ensuing fiscal years for rent of the building at the corner of Fifteenth street and Pennsylvania avenue, now occupied for the use of the Quartermaster-General's Office; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from Charles T. Gorham, acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the Senate of March 6, 1876, calling for a statement of the annual expenditures of the Indian Bureau since its organization to the present time, and also the number of Indians provided for at the expense of the Government each year since the organization of the Bureau, a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, together with the accompanying schedule therein referred to; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TRANSFER OF AN APPROPRIATION.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to have House bill No. 3356 considered without reference to a committee.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3356) authorizing the transfer of a certain appropriation.

Of the sum of $585,000, appropriated in the first section of the act of March 3, 1875, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, for salaries of nine hundred and seventy-five light-house-keepers and light-beacon-keepers, and their assistants, the bill authorizes $16,000 to be transferred to and used in aid of the appropriation made in the same act for the maintenance of lights on the Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri Rivers, and such buoys as may be necessary, including salaries of keepers.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The bill explains itself, for, as a matter of fact, Senators have had no opportunity to give consideration to it. By an act of the last session, to the expenditures under the light-house board was added the service of the light-house board for light-houses, buoys, &c., on the Mississippi River. The general appropriation mentioned in the bill, $585,000, was for the purpose of paying salaries to the light-house-keepers generally over the country. There is a deficiency in the specific appropriation which was applied to the service on the low waters of the Missouri River. Being quite a small service and not being well established, it could not be accurately told how much would be needed. It turns out, however, that there is a deficiency of about $16,000 needed to carry the service along to the end of the fiscal year. There is an immediate necessity for the action indicated in the bill, and if the money is to be used at all its use should be authorized at once. I hold in my hand documents from the Department specifying these facts, but which, unless Senators desire to hear them, I hardly think it necessary to read. That is all there is of it. The bill has passed the House.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MAXEY presented a petition of 133 citizens of Waxahachie, Ellis County, Texas, praying for the establishment of certain post-routes therein named; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. McMILLAN presented a memorial of envelope-manufacturers, printers, stationers, &c., remonstrating against the manufacture and sale by the Government of envelopes, postal-cards, &c., at or below their cost; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. HARVEY presented a resolution of the board of county commissioners of Saline County, Kansas, in favor of the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1545) declaring lands heretofore granted to certain railroad companies subject to State taxation; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WALLACE presented a memorial of liquor dealers and distillers of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 3137) to amend the laws relating to internal revenue; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Easton, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the abolition of the free-delivery system of post-office matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the town council of Easton, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against any change in the free-delivery system of post-office matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. DORSEY. I present a petition of citizens of Hot Springs, Arkansas, very numerously signed, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the Secretary will report the petition.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned, resident settlers of Hot Springs, respectfully submit for the consideration of the national Congress the following statement of facts:

In the year 1832 an act was passed by Congress reserving from entry or sale twenty-five hundred and sixty acres of land in and about the present town of Hot Springs, in the county of Garland and State of Arkansas, consisting of sections 32 and 33, and the south one-half of sections 28 and 29 in township 2 south, and the north one-half of sections 4 and 5, township 3 south, range 19 west. The celebrated hot springs are situated in the southwest one-quarter of section 33, township 2 south, range 19 west.

The population of the town of Hot Springs, consisting of between three and four thousand souls, is not of recent date; but the settlers comprising it have settled here most of them long since, and their number has been gradually increasing for many years. The well-known virtues of the hot waters in relieving many obstinate and painful diseases have for a long period offered a strong inducement for invalids to visit them, and many thousands have come and are still coming to avail themselves of their curative properties. This continual tide of visitors has induced the erection from time to time of residences, business houses, hotels, &c.

A few parties, five or six in number, have for a long time claimed ownership of the hot springs and of the ground adjacent thereto upon said reservation. To these claimants those who have erected the buildings in the town of Hot Springs have been compelled to pay continual tribute in the nature of ground-rent, yielding to said claimants an annual revenue of from $60,000 to $75,000. It thus appears that a few persons who have no title to the property have demanded and collected from those settlers who came later an unjust and oppressive ground-rent under a pretense of ownership of said ground. This anomalous condition still exists, greatly retarding the prosperity of the settlers and the growth of the town.

And therefore we, the undersigned, bona fide settlers upon said reservation, having erected substantial improvements thereon, humbly pray that such legislation may be had touching the final disposition of said reservation as will afford us the privilege of acquiring title for a fair consideration to the ground on which our improvements stand, and also such other protection and relief as Congress in its wisdom may see fit to grant.

Mr. DORSEY. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DORSEY. I also present a petition of resident settlers of Hot Springs, Arkansas, numbering, I think, something over three hundred, and representing improvements amounting to about $350,000, praying such legislation by Congress as will enable them to acquire title, for a fair consideration, to the ground on which they have erected improvements. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE presented the memorial of William McKim, president of the Peabody Institute of Baltimore, Maryland, in favor of Congress fixing some date several years in advance when the metric standard in the office of weights and measures at Washington shall be made the sole authorized public standard of weights and measures; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Daniel Girard Wright, of Baltimore, Maryland, administrator of the estate of Samuel T. Anderson, late naval store-keeper in the United States Navy, praying for the allowance and payment of claims alleged to be due the estate of Anderson for services rendered during the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented the memorial of J. W. Brandel, Evelina Brandel, and other heirs at law of J. M. Brandel, of Baltimore, Maryland, praying an allowance out of the Geneva award for losses sustained by the capture of the bark Empress Theresa by the rebel privateer Tallahassee; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of the colored people of the United States represented in national convention at Nashville, Tennessee, praying appropriate legislation under the fifteenth amendment for the protection of colored people in the exercise of their political powers; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McCREERY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 510) to give the Little Rock and Fort Smith Railway Company the right of way through the Indian Territory to a point opposite the town of Fort Smith, State of Arkansas, and for other purposes, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. KELLY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2041) to amend section 2291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 538) to create an additional land district in the Territory of Idaho, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1316) to adjust the claims of the owners of lands within the limits of the Klamath Indian reservation, in the State of Oregon, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 741) for the relief of such members of the Menomonee tribe of Indians as may desire to become citizens of the United States, reported it with an amendment; and, on motion of Mr. CLAYTON, the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 339) for the relief of E. D. Franz, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 341) for the relief of Louis Rosenbaum, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 40) to re-imburse B. F. West & Co., of Martin's Ferry, Ohio, for internal-revenue stamps stolen from the Cambridge, Ohio, post-office, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, who were directed by a resolution of the Senate of February 21 to inquire what, if any, sum may be due to Charles B. Varney, of Portland, Maine, for rent and use of lands in Portland for the years 1867 and 1868 and a part of 1869, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 808) for the relief of Charles B. Varney, of Portland, Maine.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1218) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported to Congress under section 2 of the act approved June 16, 1874, by the Secretary of the Treasury, to report it without amendment. I desire to say in making this report that under the act of 1874 a similar bill was reported at the last session of the Forty-third Congress, but as it was reported during the last days of the session no action was taken and the bill was passed over by reason of want of time and also for the further reason that the committee having received it at a very late day of that session were unable to properly examine the claims. The bill therefore failed, as it was proper it should and as the Senate seemed to think it should. The several members of the committee have examined this bill since, as far as we could, and again concur in recommending its passage. I make this statement to bring to the attention of the Senate these claims, the payment of which has been delayed at least eighteen months for these reasons. At the very earliest day I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of this bill in justice to these claimants. I shall not ask action at the present time, but if I can get the floor for this purpose at any time during the day I shall do so.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of George E. Payne, of the parish of Saint Charles, Louisiana, praying compensation for damages for the seizure and occupation of his plantation by the Government during the war of the rebellion, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 809) referring the claim of George E. Payne to the Court of Claims.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WADLEIGH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Treadwell S. Ayres, praying compensation for the use and occupancy of his property at Memphis, Tennessee, by the United States Army during the late war, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 810) for the relief of Treadwell S. Ayres, of Memphis, Tennessee.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Perez Dickinson, surviving partner of the firm of Cowan & Dickinson, of Knoxville, Tennessee, praying compensation for the loss of two hundred and fifty-six bales of cotton seized by order of General Burnside on the 17th and 18th of November, 1863, and used for strengthening the defenses of Knoxville, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 811) for the relief of Perez Dickinson, the surviving partner of James Cowan, deceased, heretofore trading and doing business under the firm-name and style of Cowan & Dickinson, of Knoxville, East Tennessee.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of J. M. Irwin, praying to be re-imbursed for an amount of moneys paid by him for two pieces of land purchased by him near Memphis, Tennessee, and which were sold by the United States authorities for non-payment of direct taxes, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. McMILLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 812) for the relief of William S. Grow; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF TESTIMONY.

Mr. MORTON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That 300 copies of the testimony taken in the investigation of the charges against Hon. GEORGE E. SPENCER be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. Does not such a resolution go to the Committee on Printing?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the expense would come within $500, so that it may be passed without a reference.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I ask the Secretary to read an article from the New York World of last Saturday, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the paper referred to, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

MORTON NEXT—ANOTHER PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE'S HONESTY IMPUGNED—ALLEGED MISAPPLICATION OF TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY THOUSAND DOLLARS.

[Special dispatch to the World.]

WASHINGTON, April 28.

Several days ago a correspondent of the World was informed that there were important documents in the Second Comptroller's Office of the Treasury which would reveal another republican presidential candidate, Senator MORTON, in an unpromising light. The correspondence, whatever it might be, was between MORTON and one of the State agents in Indiana during the war, and is on file in the Department.

The facts of the case, as alleged, are these: In the Thirty-seventh Congress an act making an appropriation to pay the expenses of transporting and delivering arms and munitions of war to the loyal citizens of the States of which the inhabitants now are or hereafter may be in rebellion against the Government of the United States, and to provide for the expense of organizing them into companies, battalions, regiments, or otherwise, for their own protection against violence, insurrection, invasion, or rebellion, was passed July 31, 1861. Two million dollars were appropriated under this act. It will be observed that the title is very loosely drawn, and is susceptible of various constructions. Among the list of war expenditures in connection with the above is this item: "For supplying transportation and delivery of arms and munitions of war in States in rebellion against the Government of the United States, O. P. MORTON, Governor of Indiana, $250,000." Indiana was never in rebellion against the Government of the United States, and it was a query why MORTON should have had $250,000 when there was no purpose under the statute making the appropriation for which the money could have been legally expended.

It was brought to the attention of the correspondent that in the Indiana Legislature of 1861 some difficulty had occurred between the democrats and republicans. The two parties were a tie in the senate and the democrats had a majority in the house. The republican senators broke the quorum to prevent some party legislation, and the time of the session slipped by until compelled to adjourn without the transaction of any business. No appropriations were made, not even for the expenses of running the State government. Everything seemed to be in danger of coming to a stand-still in Indiana, when MORTON made a trip to Washington, and upon his return to Indianapolis he opened the paymaster's office and began to pay the expenses of the State government. No one except MORTON's bosom friends knew where he got the money; but very few know to this day. The proper way to have obtained money to run the State machinery would have been to convene the Legislature for the purpose of passing appropriation bills. This the radical MORTON would not do, as the Legislature was democratic. That MORTON obtained his money from the two-million-dollar appropriation above referred to is certain; that he misapplied $250,000 the correspondence in the Treasury Department will show. Three unsuccessful attempts have been made by members of Congress to obtain this correspondence. Secretary Bristow, perhaps with a desire to avoid doing anything that would injure a candidate in the presidential race, for which he is an aspirant, seems to be unwilling that it shall be made public. Upon the first request for the correspondence Mr. Bristow signified a wish that Mr. MORTON should know what was coming before any steps were taken in the case. The member prosecuting the search acquiesced, and was soon interviewed by MORTON, who was considerably excited, demanded to know if a public investigation into the affair was to be made, and said he should summon witnesses from Indiana to testify in his behalf. He did telegraph for a man by the name of Sturm, who arrived in this city to-day. Sturm was arsenal agent in the State during the war. Another attempt to obtain, or at least examine, the correspondence pertaining to the case will be made on Monday, and Secretary Bristow will do well to open every avenue that can place light on the transaction. It will be investigated by Mr. GLOVER's committee on the real-estate pool.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the President of the United States in the spring of 1863 advanced to me $250,000 to enable me to carry forward military operations in the State of Indiana. Of this sum I expended $133,302.91 in the service of the State and with which I charged the State in my settlement with it, and the remaining $116,697.09 were not expended. This amount I returned to the Treasury of the United States, as is shown by the following voucher and receipt:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 11, 1865.

SIR: Yours of the 6th instant, inclosing a duplicate certificate of deposit issued by the First National Bank of Indianapolis, Indiana, in your favor, No. 360, date of the 6th instant, for $116,697.09, on account of moneys due and refunded to the United States, has been received.

I am, very respectfully,

GEO. HARRINGTON,
Assistant Secretary.

Hon. O. P. MORTON,
Indianapolis, Indiana.

The $133,302.91 which I had expended on behalf of the State were paid back to the Government by giving the Government credit for that amount upon advances which had been made by the State in the conduct of the war, which advances were duly audited by the Treasury Department and allowed as just and valid claims against the Government in favor of the State. This settlement and final adjustment of the whole sum of $250,000 are shown by the following voucher and quietus from the Office of the Second Auditor of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
November 8, 1865.

SIR: The charge of $250,000 on the books of this Office on account "supplying arms to loyal citizens in revolted States" has this day been closed on the books of this Office, to wit, by a deposit by you of $116,697.09 and a transfer of $133,302.91 of funds from the books of the Third Auditor's Office to your credit on the books of this Office.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JNO. M. SIMS,
for Auditor.

His Excellency O. P. MORTON,
Governor of Indiana, Indianapolis, Indiana.

From these vouchers it will appear that the whole sum of $250,000 was accounted for and repaid to the Government.

It will be proper in this connection to state the circumstances under which the $250,000 were advanced to me by the President and the use made of it, to show that it was not misapplied.

At the October election in 1862 in Indiana the democrats carried the State by a majority of over 10,000, electing a large majority in each branch of the Legislature and their candidates for the State offices. The democrats had the Legislature, all the State offices, and the judges of the supreme court, and possessed the whole power in the State government except the executive. When the Legislature assembled, in the first week in January, 1863, its conduct was characterized by the most intense hostility to the administration and to the prosecution of the war. I sent my message to the two houses on the second day of its session. The senate received, read, and printed it in the usual way. The house refused to receive it and directed the clerk to return it to me, and on the next day adopted a resolution approving the message of Governor Seymour, of New York.

The revolutionary policy thus inaugurated was pursued with increased violence and open disregard of constitutional obligations. The time was chiefly consumed by the introduction of disloyal resolutions, the utterance of factious and treasonable sentiments, intended to excite the people against the Government and destroy its power to suppress the rebellion. On the 17th of February a bill was introduced into the house which was intended to strip me as governor of all military power in the State. It provided that all the arms should be placed in the custody of the auditor, treasurer, secretary, and attorney-general of the State, to be kept, issued, or disposed of only by them. It deprived the governor of all power to call out the militia for any purpose whatever. It provided that all officers of the militia should be appointed and commissioned by these four State officers, and not by the governor, as required by the constitution of the State. It provided for the repeal of the existing militia law, the dissolution of all brigades, regiments, and companies formed under that law, the surrender of their arms into the hands of the agents to be appointed by the four State officers, and rendered null and void all outstanding commissions. In short, this bill transferred to the four State officers the military power which was vested in the governor by the constitution, was revolutionary and unconstitutional in every feature, and intended for disloyal purposes. The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time by a strict party vote.

The legislative history of this bill could not be better given than in language employed by the Union members of the Legislature in their "Address to the people of the State:"

> The military bill had come from the midnight caucus to the House; had been printed and forced to its engrossment without the change of a word or letter; all amendments and substitutes had been voted down; all references to committees had been refused, although every other bill of a general character that had gone to a second reading had been referred to some committee; the previous question had been sustained, the gag applied, and all debate cut off, and the bill engrossed. Nothing was left for us but to sit by and see this infamous measure passed through, the revolution consummated, and civil war begun, or to quietly retire and leave the house without a quorum; there was no other peaceful and constitutional remedy. If it had been left to the courts to annul it before the question could have been determined, the law would have done its work.
> The military power once in the hands of the conspirators, it would be a matter of no importance what the courts might decide; and if the question took the course of others before the Supreme Court, it might be months or years before the decision was made. The path of duty was the path of safety, and we had no doubt nor hesitation as to the course we should pursue.
> We were willing and anxious and repeatedly proposed to the majority to return and pass the appropriation bills with all other legitimate and lawful legislation; but they replied to us contemptuously that they intended to pass every one of their ultra measures before they took up the appropriation bills.
> The military bill violated absolutely no less than seven plain and vital provisions of the State constitution, and subverted entirely the scheme of government invented by the framers of that instrument. Its passage would have been an act of revolution inevitably attended by civil war and a collision with the Government of the United States.

It had become manifest that the democratic members of the Legislature were determined to pass the bill at all hazards, which would unquestionably have resulted in civil war. I could not and would not surrender my powers as governor under the constitution, nor could the Government of the United States afford to have me do so, for the purpose of the proceeding was to neutralize the position of Indiana in the war and to take her out of the line of loyal States northwest of the Ohio River. The very pendency of the bill and the avowed purpose to pass it caused the most intense ferment, and at once threatened the peace and safety of the State. I could veto the bill, but a simple majority could pass it over the veto, so that that would amount to nothing. The republicans had barely enough members in the house of representatives to break the quorum and break up the Legislature. Consultations were had with the republican members of the Legislature and leading republican citizens from different parts of the State, who were summoned for that purpose, and it was the deliberate judgment of all, in which mine fully concurred, that the passage of the bill would involve the State in civil war. The republican members of the house therefore withdrew from the body to prevent the final passage of the bill. All the appropriation bills to carry on the State government, except one to pay the per diem and mileage of members, had been kept behind this military bill, so that when the Legislature adjourned there were no appropriations made for any civil or military purpose. There was plenty of money in the State treasury, but it was locked against me. I made an appeal to the people of the State setting forth the situation and asking them to furnish me with money to carry on the State government, to support the militia, and organize troops for the United States. The county commissioners in the county of Marion, in which the capital is located, came forward and advanced me $20,000 out of the county treasury. This example was followed by many other counties in the State, by several banks, railroad companies, and by individuals, until a large sum of money had been raised. Under the constitution the Legislature met but once in two years unless convened in extra session by the governor, and the next session in course would not begin until January, 1865.

After obtaining all the money I could from the counties and other sources, I made a calculation and found that I would lack about $250,000 to carry me through to January, 1865, and to make my position secure came to Washington to see if I could not obtain that amount from the Government of the United States. After a careful review of the situation by the President, Mr. Lincoln, and the Secretary of War, Mr. Stanton, the President advanced me the sum of $250,000. They both agreed that Indiana was threatened with rebellion and that the condition of the State came directly within the letter and spirit of the act of Congress approved July 31, 1861. Mr. Stanton declared to the President with great emphasis that if Indiana lost her position as a loyal State the final success of the Government in suppressing the rebellion would be endangered and that the governor must be sustained at whatever cost or hazard. The history and character of the transaction is shown by the following extract from my annual message to the Legislature of Indiana in January, 1865:

> Upon the adjournment of the Legislature I found myself unprovided, with the exception of a small balance of the military contingent fund, with money or appropriations for military purposes. New regiments could not be raised under the requisitions of the Government, nor recruiting carried forward, without the use of large sums of money. The legion (militia) had received no pay for their services from the beginning of the war, and the organization could not be successfully continued unless payment was made, and the men re-imbursed for their actual expenditures, for which the appropriation for the legion fund, made in 1861, was inadequate. The southern border was still disturbed by threats and danger of invasion, and such steps were to be taken, if possible, as would guarantee peace and security to our people. In this dilemma, I determined to apply to the President for an advance under an appropriation made by Congress, on the 31st of July, 1861, which act is in these words:
> "Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the sum of $2,000,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be expended, under the direction of the President of the United States, in supplying and defraying the expenses of transporting and delivering such arms and munitions of war as in his judgment may be expedient and proper, to place in the hands of any of the loyal citizens residing in any of the States, of which the inhabitants are in rebellion against the Government of the United States, or in which the rebellion is, or may be threatened, and likewise for defraying such expenses as may be properly incurred, in organizing and sustaining, while so organized, any of such citizens into companies, battalions, regiments, or otherwise, for their own protection against domestic violence, insurrection, invasion, or rebellion."
> After a full consideration of the condition of affairs in Indiana, the President advanced to me, as a disbursing officer, out of said appropriation, the sum of $250,000. It will be perceived that this money was not paid to me as a loan to the State, or an advance to the State upon debts due to her from the General Government, and creates no debt against the State whatever, but that in theory it is an expenditure made by the President, through me, as his disbursing agent. It has, however, been disbursed exclusively in the name and for the benefit of the State, in the payment of necessary military expenses, for which the State should have made ample appropriations. I have advanced to the paymaster of the State forces, at different times, the sum of $171,661.88, of which the greater portions, however, has been reimbursed to me by the General Government, upon my filing, in the proper Department, the receipted pay-rolls of the Indiana legion for services rendered in the war. For a detailed account of the expenditures of the military fund, the Legislature is referred to the financial report of Hon. W. H. H. Terrell, financial secretary, which is herewith submitted, and to the vouchers on file in this department. All of these expenditures were laid before the auditing committee, appointed by the late Legislature, for examination, and received their approval. As will be shown by the report, I had on hand, on the 1st day of January, 1865, of the military fund, the sum of $115,487.28, and the question is now presented as to the proper method of settlement with the Government for this fund. One of two ways may be adopted. First, by returning to the Government the balance of the fund unexpended, and by settling with it for the amount expended, upon vouchers of expenditures, after the same shall have been approved by the Legislature; and this would be in accordance with the theory upon which the money was originally advanced by the President. Second, by paying into the State treasury the unexpended part of the fund, and treating the whole as an advance to the State, to be accounted for by her in her general settlement with the Government for advances made. This latter plan is, in my judgment, more consonant with justice and the honor of the State, the money having been expended for purposes for which the State was honorably and patriotically bound to make provision.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

The total amount of cash received by me is		$1,026,321 31
I have disbursed—
For civil purposes, on vouchers	$199,644 93
For military purposes, on vouchers	702,420 15
Total		902,065 08
Leaving a balance in my hands of		124,256 23

Of this balance, $8,768.95 belong to the funds received on account of civil expenses and $115,487.28 on account of funds received for military expenses.

In conclusion on this subject, I respectfully request that a joint committee of the two houses be speedily appointed to investigate the civil and military expenditures I have made since the adjournment of the last Legislature, and to examine the vouchers for the same on file in my department, and that the Legislature will make prompt provision for the repayment of the money I have borrowed for public purposes. It was advanced from patriotic motives, with a full reliance upon the good faith of the State for its re-imbursement, and without it the machinery of the State government could not have been kept in motion.

A joint committee of the two houses, embracing some of the ablest democratic members, was appointed, as requested in my message, who patiently investigated all my accounts, including the expenditure of $133,302.91, which I had obtained from the President, and unanimously reported them correct, taking no exception even to the amount of one cent. The unexpended portion of the $250,000 which I had received from the President and which I described in my message as the military fund, but which was erroneously stated in the message as $115,000 instead of $116,000, I did not pay into the State treasury, as suggested in the message, but refunded directly to the General Government, as before shown; and the $133,302.91 which I had expended for the State were settled with the Government by giving credit to the Government for that amount on the indebtedness of the Government to the State, as before shown. After the full examination of my accounts the Legislature made appropriations to pay my borrowed money and the debts I had contracted; also the sum of about $600,000—the exact amount, however, I am not able to state from memory—which I had procured Messrs. Winslow, Lanier & Co., of New York, to advance in the payment of the interest upon the bonds of the State during the years 1863 and 1864, the payment of which interest had been withheld by the auditor and treasurer of the State. During these two years all payments for civil and military expenses of the State, including the benevolent institutions and the penitentiaries and excepting only the salaries of public officers, were paid upon my own check through a financial bureau established in my office, the State auditor and State treasurer declining all co-operation.

My course was approved by the people of Indiana by my re-election as governor in October, 1864, by a majority of more than 20,000 and by the election of a republican Legislature and republican State officers. The intermediate history between the events I have described in the spring of 1863 and the meeting of the Legislature in January, 1865, I will refer to but briefly, although it is extraordinary in its character and unlike that of any other State.

The State was honey-combed with secret societies formerly known as Knights of the Golden Circle, but at that time as Sons of Liberty. They claimed in 1864 to have 40,000 members in the State, were lawless, defiant, plotting treason against the United States and the overthrow of the State government. In some counties their operations were so formidable as to require the militia to be kept on a war footing, and, throughout 1863 and until the final explosion and exposure of the organization in August, 1864, kept the whole State in an uproar and alarm. So bold were their demonstrations through the summer of 1863 that General John Morgan, of Kentucky, was induced to invade the State with his forces, in the belief that there would be a general uprising in his support. In 1864, so numerous were these treasonable organizations and so confident were they of their strength that they matured a plan for a general uprising in the city of Indianapolis on the 16th of August, to be under cover of a mass meeting of the democratic party, to be attended by the members of these organizations from all parts of the State. The plan, as shown by subsequent confessions of some of the leading conspirators, was on that day to release about seven thousand rebel prisoners confined in Camp Morton, seize the arsenal and arm these prisoners, overturn the State government, and take possession of the State. This plan could not be kept secret. It was developed some three weeks before the time fixed, and was abandoned by the leading conspirators, and orders issued countermanding the march of their forces upon Indianapolis. Subsequently the discovery and seizure of a large amount of arms and ammunition collected at Indianapolis for treasonable purposes, and the seizure of the records and rituals of the order of the Sons of Liberty, giving the names of the principal conspirators, and the arrest of some eight of the ringleaders had the effect to break up and destroy the power of the organization; and I regret to have to state that in the list of the principal members of this organization were found the names of three of the State officers, into whose hands the Legislature of 1863 had attempted to place the whole military power of the State. Upon the trial of these ringleaders before a military tribunal appointed by the President under an act of Congress, some of them turned State's evidence and disclosed the full character and extent of the conspiracy. Four of them were convicted and sentenced to death, one of whom made his escape; another was pardoned outright by President Johnson, and two others, Bowles and Milligan, had their punishment commuted by President Johnson to imprisonment for life, but were afterward released by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States to the effect that the military commission had no jurisdiction to try them for the offense. There is a large volume of unpublished history showing in detail the operations of these organizations, who were their aiders and abettors, and the connection they had with the politics of the day.

It may be proper to state here that the democratic Legislature of 1863, before its sudden adjournment, had appointed an auditing committee of its own members to audit and supervise all of my accounts and expenditures for military purposes, which sat almost continuously until January, 1865, and that this committee did audit and approve every one of my expenditures, including that of the $133,302.91 of the fund obtained from the President. The same Legislature also appointed a committee to investigate all my expenditures and accounts from the beginning of the war up to January, 1863. This investigation was prosecuted with great diligence until late in the spring of 1863 and after the breaking up of the Legislature. Failing to find anything wrong in my accounts, to the amount of even one cent, the democratic majority of the committee refused to make any report at all; but the republican minority made a report indorsing and sustaining my official conduct in every particular.

Mr. McDONALD. I desire to state, Mr. President, that at some future time, with the leave of the Senate, I shall have something to say in reference to the review which my colleague has felt it necessary to give of the political history of our State during the period that is embraced in his remarks. I have nothing at all to say in regard to his vindication of himself against any charge of personal corruption, but we differ very widely in regard to our views of the political action of our State during that period and of the parties concerned.

Mr. MORTON. I wish to state, Mr. President, that in giving the history of politics in Indiana and of the military operations there I desire, as an act of justice, to exculpate my colleague from any complicity in that conspiricy. It is due to him to say that.

Mr. ANTHONY. I well remember, Mr. President, the bold and patriotic course that was taken by the Senator from Indiana, then the governor of that State, at the interesting period to which he has referred. I vividly recall the thrill of exultation which passed through every loyal heart when he sent howling to their homes the men who, traitors alike to the General Government and to their own State, false both to the Union and to the pretensions of State rights upon which those who revolted against the Union alone defended themselves, gave aid and comfort to the common enemy in arms alike against the United States and against the State of Indiana.

It is not strange that that act, as every other act of every public man, right or wrong, good or bad, true or imputed, is made the occasion of vilification; for we live in a time of public scandal and no man who holds any public position, scarcely any man who interests himself in public affairs, escapes the general vituperation. Men whose lives have been passed in the reputable and even in the illustrious service of their country are held up to the execration of the people whose good-will they enjoy and whose gratitude some of them have earned. The testimony has been worthy of the accusation. Discharged employés, broken-down contractors, illicit distillers, disappointed office-seekers, men compared to whom Titus Oates was a credible witness, have been permitted to drag the reputations of honorable men before tribunals which in their methods of jurisprudence remind us of the star chamber, and whose interpretation of the laws of evidence and of the rights of the accused were borrowed from the Spanish inquisition.

Nay, Mr. President, the penitentiary and the mad-house have given up their dead in this general resurrection of falsehood and perjury. It is but a few days since the whole country was startled with the foreshadowing of some terrible revelation against the elected chief of the Republic. We were told that he had committed a crime so atrocious that it could not be named; but when it was exhibited to the American people in its unparalleled enormity nothing but the shortest methods of the quickest impeachment would stand between you, Mr. President, and the White House, which I hope, at some day, you will reach by a less circuitous route. And, Mr. President, when this accusation was put to the proof, when the testimony upon which all these charges had been made was adduced, it appeared that a crazy man was ready to testify, with a solemnity that left no doubt of the sincerity of his conviction, that the spirit of General Grant was accustomed to pass through the key-hole of his chamber by night and to stand beside his bed. And upon the promise of that testimony, and nothing else whatever, a thousand newspapers opened their batteries upon the character of the man who had borne the flag of his country in triumph from the fallen ramparts of Fort Donelson to the captured citadel of the rebellion, and who had been twice elected by the people to the highest place in their gift.

The miserable instruments of all this scandal will be likely to escape or will be beaten with "few stripes." Reputation they have none to be injured; generally as poor in purse as they are in honor, they laugh at fines and confiscations; and the universal contempt in which they are held by those who suffer from them and by those who employ them will probably preserve the penitentiary from the contamination of their presence. But, sir, behind these are men who have a name and a stake in the country, men who employ or encourage these miserable instruments in scandals with which they scorn to soil their own hands, but from which they expect profit to party. Let these men turn to history. Its pages are full of illustrations of Bloody instructions, which, being taught, return to plague the inventor.

And history will be reversed if the poisoned shafts which they have placed in the hands of others are not turned upon their own defenseless bosoms, if their own reputations do not suffer by the methods by which they have allowed others to be assailed, and if the distress which they have carried to the innocent homes of others is not returned to their own.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair announces that the morning hour has expired.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I desire to say only two or three words.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania will proceed if there be no objection.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. It happens, Mr. President, that at the beginning of the war I was in a position which enabled me to know something of the conduct of the then governor of Indiana. I have listened to his statement this morning with interest, because I have always felt a great regard for him personally. I remember well that he was perhaps the youngest governor in the Union at the time the rebellion broke out. He lived in a border State. A great portion of its people had come from the South. They were not only citizens there, but they were citizens of great influence. He was very much embarrassed by opposition in everything he did; but no matter what the difficulties presented to him he surmounted them all, because he was determined to do everything which an honest, able, and patriotic man should do for his country. At the beginning of the rebellion he sent more troops, and with greater alacrity, than any one of the States, to the seat of war. His State had no arsenals and no arms; and when the Government at Washington was unable to furnish his troops with guns and munitions of war he bought them on his own credit, trusting that the government of Indiana would pay for them if the Government of the United States should not do so. At this day men have forgotten the straits to which those in power at Washington had to resort to obtain supplies for the thousands of men who were willing and eager to tender their services for the defense of their imperiled country.

I believed then that no other man but that young governor of Indiana could have saved that State from being carried out of the Union. He was embarrassed by the legislation of his State, he was embarrassed by many of the leading men of it also; no appropriations were made by its Legislature, and yet he established manufactories for all the necessaries of the Army there. He established storehouses and built hospitals without the means to pay them. It is true that after a while the Government re-imbursed his State for all the expenditures made there; but if he or some other man with the wonderful energy which he possessed had not been where he was, Indiana would have fallen and would have been a part of the southern confederacy which they were attempting to build up, with great hopes of success, in the first year of the struggle.

Again, when men began to falter at the end of 1862 and the beginning of 1863, when our armies generally met with reverses, there was that young governor again calling a meeting in the State of Pennsylvania of all the loyal governors, and he met them there and gave encouragement to the faltering men of other States.

I verily believe that no man in the United States did more to give victory to our armies than did OLIVER PERRY MORTON; and I have honored him ever since I knew him and witnessed his great services; and I am glad that he has been assailed, because an honest man can afford to be assailed and assaulted, in the certainty that in good time justice is sure to be done him.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 3360) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to pay the expenses of delegates from the eastern band of Cherokee Indians; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 110) authorizing the exhibition of a life-saving station house at the centennial exposition.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 40) granting a pension to Elmira E. Cravath;

A bill (S. No. 130) to relinquish the interest of the United States in certain lands to the city and county of San Francisco, in the State of California;

A bill (S. No. 504) granting a pension to Nancy True;

A bill (S. No. 425) granting a pension to James Eli Butts and Malinda Frances Butts; and

A bill (S. No. 761) to remove the political disabilities of James E. Slaughter, of Alabama.

JAPANESE INDEMNITY FUND.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Chair will call up the unfinished business of yesterday. The bill (S. No. 626) in relation to the Japanese indemnity fund is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole; and the pending question is on the motion of the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the consent of the Senator from California I desire to amend the first section of the bill by striking out all after the word "provided" in line 6 and inserting the words which I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to amend the first section. That motion is in order before the motion to strike out, and the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "provided" in line 6 of the first section and to insert in lieu of the matter to be stricken out:

And the residue of said Japanese indemnity fund, together with all accumulations of interest, shall be transferred to the Treasurer of the United States; so much thereof as consists of bonds of the United States shall be canceled and destroyed, as in the case of the payment of such bonds; and so much as consists of money shall be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the section be read as it would stand if so amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. If amended as proposed, the section will read as follows:

That the President be, and hereby is, authorized to reserve from the Japanese indemnity fund the sum of $125,000, to be used in the manner hereinafter provided; and the residue of said Japanese indemnity fund, together with all accumulations of interest, shall be transferred to the Treasurer of the United States; so much thereof as consists of bonds of the United States shall be canceled and destroyed, as in the case of the payment of such bonds; and so much as consists of money shall be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I infer from that that this money is either in the form of cash or of bonds of the United States alone; that there is no other sort of security.

Mr. SHERMAN. I inquired of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] if that was the case, and he so understands it. At all events, the amendment provides to cover the whole case by transferring to the Treasury the whole fund. So much as consists of money is to be covered into the Treasury, and so much as is in bonds is to be canceled as if the bonds were paid, and the balance will be left for disposition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it will bear that construction, very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. I drew it so. I have no doubt it is all in United States bonds.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it probably is.

Mr. SHERMAN. For some years we have had the subject of the Japanese indemnity fund discussed before the Senate of the United States. Various appropriations have been made from time to time out of this fund for the purposes of paying losses, expenses, or the like, either to private parties or to officers of the United States; and at different times propositions have been made for the disposition of the fund itself. At one time a proposition was made to establish a school or seminary of learning to teach our own youths the Japanese language. Various other projects have been suggested. I do not wish now to enter into this debate; but I am entirely satisfied that the best use the Government of the United States can make of this money is to put it in the Treasury of the United States, where it belongs. The idea of establishing separate funds, the Japanese fund and the naval-pension fund and various other funds, because the money comes into the Treasury rather in an indirect way, is I think wrong, unless the law expressly provides for it.

It seems to me this money ought to have gone into the Treasury of the United States when it was received from Japan. It should not have been set aside as a special fund for any purpose unless the law expressly required it to be so set aside. Every demand has been made upon the fund that anybody can suggest, so that it can now be said that no private citizen can be interested in this fund; and in this condition of affairs it seems to me the best disposition of it is to cover it into the Treasury of the United States. To pay it to Japan, as is now proposed, would be for us to confess that we have wronged Japan, that we have extorted money from her, and that we now surrender that which we have extorted. It puts her in a position of humiliation, accepting money that was forced from her unduly and unjustly.

I do not believe such was the condition of affairs. I believe the Senator from Vermont properly stated this as a settlement in the nature of liquidated damages, not only for the losses to our commerce, but for expenses incurred by the United States in putting down the lawless force of the daimios of Nagato, one of the provinces of Japan, and that the money was properly levied upon Japan; partly you may say as a means of punishment, partly to deter future lawless outrages, partly to re-imburse expenses caused to the United States, and partly to re-imburse our own citizens for losses in their commerce; partly as a means of enabling us to pay for extraordinary services rendered by our Navy. All these purposes have been accomplished, and now it does seem to me that the best disposition of this money is to turn it into the Treasury of the United States. We are in no condition to merely give this money to Japan so as to appear to be grand, liberal, generous. It seems to me no good object can be accomplished by that course. On the contrary, it will be an act of humiliation to Japan; a cognovit of violence and wrong on our part, which I do not believe we have committed; and therefore the best disposition to end this Japanese fund is to put it where it cannot be got at except by an appropriation made according to law.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I listened to the debate yesterday in which the history of this fund was given with a good deal of detail, and I am of opinion that we do not own this money in justice. I think the correspondence of our own minister and the history which is given of the transaction show that we are not justly entitled to this money; in a word, that we have got it wrongfully; and I think therefore we should not cover it into our Treasury, but should restore it to the government whence it came.

It was received as a fund to indemnify this Government and its citizens for losses or damage sustained at the hands of the Japanese government. It is a confessed fact here and before the world that every claim which has been made upon the fund, which has been in our hands for years, has been fully paid. Here was a fund set apart to pay all persons who suffered any detriment, and the claims of all who could make any fair legal or equitable demand upon it have been discharged, and it remains now confessedly a fund which is either to go into the Treasury of the Government or to go back to those who put it into the hands of the Government for an indemnity against loss and damage. Therefore if we put it into the Treasury it seems to me it is a confession to the world that we have this much money to which there is no claimant, and that we appropriate it to our own use as a government. I do not think we can afford to do that.

Again, allow me to say (because I listened with great interest to the history of this transaction as given by the two Senators who gave it at length yesterday) that it is pretty clear, from the correspondence of our minister and from the contemporaneous action, that when these four powers, Great Britain, France, the Netherlands, and the United States of America, made this treaty by which a fund was paid over to indemnify our citizens and our Government, with the others, for any losses, really the four governments stood there with their ships of war, with their munitions and navy, arrayed in a very threatening attitude toward the Japanese government. We cannot resist the conclusion, it seems to me, that they were ready to give us more than we asked; and I observe in a letter of Mr. Pruyn, our minister, that they paid more than he had any idea of asking, not so much at his instance though as at the instance of others.

We having got the fund in that way, it having been preserved as a fund, an indemnity fund, treated as such, having been used to indemnify everybody that had a claim, justice requires us to pay it back to the government of Japan. If it is a confession of wrong, it is a very honorable confession for us to make to say to that barbarous people—to that government and people that have such prejudices against "outside strangers," as they call us—that if, under these circumstances, when they were weakened by rebellion and these four powers were strong before them demanding indemnity, they, through fear or any other motive, gave us more than would indemnify us, we will never put it into our Treasury, but will hand it back to them. If we do this, it will be the instance of a government doing what an honest individual would do.

I therefore am against this amendment and in favor of the first section of the bill. I think we ought to restore what remains of this fund after every claim in reference to it has been paid, to hand it back to the government that gave it to us; and, believe me, it will have more effect to cultivate good relations between our Government and our people and that government and that people, it will have more effect to bring about that intercourse, commercial and social, which is desirable, than all the fleets and all the armies that we can ever put upon their border. This will make them feel that in dealing with their government and its people we will not forget justice, although we have in our hands that which might tempt us to do so; that we will deal justly with them; that we will restore to them that which was taken almost at the mouth of the cannon from them; that we will give it back to them, only meaning then, and clearly intending now, to keep no dollar of that fund beyond what would indemnify us for the wrong which was done our people and our Government at that time. That will open to us the trade of Japan much more rapidly than any enforced treaties at the point of the bayonet; and therefore I hope we shall vote down the amendment of the Senator from Ohio and pass the first section of this bill.

Mr. BOOTH. Mr. President, I have listened with more than usual interest to the very able discussion of this subject. So far as it involves a question of international law, in the rightful or wrongful exaction of indemnity from the Japanese government, I can contribute nothing to its elucidation. I cannot even restate the historical facts which were the occasion of the indemnity with that precision and accuracy which intelligent discussion upon this floor demands. If the decision of this question depends upon the exact knowledge of facts in their sequence and effect or the niceties of construction of international law, in the discussion between the learned Senators from New Jersey and Vermont the scales are held in such equal poise that a just appreciation of intellect and learning would desire to give the verdict to both and justice hesitate before declaring for either.

Behind all questions of the preponderance of fact or precise construction of law there seems to be a sentiment, not morbid, but of an instinctive sense of right, that this money is not ours, under which the public conscience is uneasy; a feeling that it is a tribute from the weak to the strong, not a just debt; that it is a penalty which power enforces, not indemnity for an injury suffered.

Sir, it is easy to convict the government of Japan upon the text of Grotius and Puffendorf and Lawrence's Wheaton, which are supposed to contain for us the refinements of the distinctions of international rights and the distillation of the wisdom of the ages of that civilization which we inherit and enjoy. But we must not forget that this whole transaction arose out of and was a necessary part of our unsuccessful attempt to force Japan into an unwilling initiation into that civilization by whose severest rules she was judged in the first stages of her novitiate.

No one will contend that Japan originally sought or desired intercourse with us and the community of nations. She was content in her isolation of trade, of character, and life. The currents of commerce had swept round her and left her as a spared monument of Oriental life, over which hung the undisturbed and impenetrable mystery of uncounted and countless ages.

Curiosity, avarice, enterprise, inexorable necessity, call it what you will, sought her and found her out. That civilization which had its origin in the east swept westward around the world until the circuit was complete, and after its journey of thousands of years, when it again reached the gates of the morning, it did not bring the message of peace but of force, and the tribute it demanded was not of praise but of gold.

The opening of Japan to trade and intercourse is a part of the romance of history. To us only an incident, to the future historian a curious chapter, to the Japanese a revolution, a revelation as strange to them as it would be to us if a continent should arise from the sea peopled with a race of human beings, akin to us in form, sense, and mortality, but with arts which should make ours appear as the toys and playthings of childhood.

Of course the rulers of Japan were not utterly ignorant of the outside world, but they did not believe the happiness of their people would be promoted by becoming a part of it, and the great mass of the people were as ignorant of its conditions as we are of the depths of the sea. What we call the necessities of trade which forced open the barriers of their exclusiveness was really the desire for gain. I have heard or read somewhere—and, as I cannot authenticate it, I may claim for it the sanction of that fitting imagination which is often truer than fact—of a Japanese ruler who, in an interview with the representative of a foreign power, mournfully recognized the inevitable necessity which brought his people with the sharp competitions, the strange artificial wants and inextricable diplomacy of occidental life. His people were flesh and blood, like the peoples of other lands, of like passions and suffering, but the qualities of their lives had been subdued and tempered by immemorial ages to the condition of their island home.

I can imagine the consternation of this people with their traditional fear, dread, and abhorrence of foreign races, when they began to learn that the exclusiveness which had been not a policy but a part of their lives was to be violated, when they began to fear they might be drowned in the rising waters of a moral deluge.

I can forgive much to the vacillations of the Mikado, and Tycoon, and daimios when the wrath of the people was behind them and the inexorable exactions of the foreign powers before; I can extenuate their offense in not having progressed beyond the high axiom of modern diplomacy, "that language was invented to conceal thought," to that still higher culmination of the wisdom of statecraft, "The best way to deceive is to speak the truth."

Picturing to myself the agony of suspense of these Japanese rulers between foreign war and domestic insurrection, with a history dear to them as ours to us dissolving behind them, a sea of untried dangers before, I look around this Chamber and see Senators in their cushioned seats consulting Grotius, Vattel, and Lawrence's Wheaton to decide what the Japanese rulers should have done and what they left undone in the dread issues of that hour which separated the past they loved and revered from the future they dreaded and feared, and calculating just how much these simple islanders, who were ignorant of paper money and scarcely knew the difference of the value of gold and silver, should pay for any mistake of the policy of their government or any failure to attain to the high standard of diplomatic candor.

Sir, if this question is to be decided by dividing a hair between the north and northwest side, I cannot decide it intelligently. But of these facts I am assured: Every treaty, every concession made by Japan was under the moral coercion of fear and implied menace. She yielded only to necessity. The adaptability, the desire to conform to the new order of things and make the best of it on the part of the Japanese is above admiration and beyond praise. It is almost a new phase in human nature. Yet, "I cannot but remember such things were as were most dear to them." I trust the change may redound to their advantage and happiness, that they may become a great factor in civilization. But I am unwilling that the opening chapter of their new history should commemorate the payment to this nation, which professed to stand god-father at their baptism, of that tribute which only the weak will yield and only the powerful exact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

Mr. SHERMAN. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. If the amendment of the Senator from Ohio should be agreed to, would it then be in order to move to amend the section further by striking out the remainder of it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would be in order. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "provided," in the sixth line of the first section, and insert:

And the residue of said Japanese indemnity fund, together with all accumulations of interest, shall be transferred to the Treasurer of the United States; so much thereof as consists of bonds of the United States shall be canceled and destroyed, as in the case of the payment of such bonds; and so much as consists of money shall be covered into the Treasury.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Clayton, Cockrell, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Harvey, Howe, Kelly, Key, McCreery, Maxey, Mitchell, Paddock, Sargent, Sherman, Wadleigh, and Withers—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Eaton, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamilton, Kernan, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Randolph, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Windom, and Wright—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bayard, Bruce, Caperton, Conover, Cragin, English, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Patterson, Robertson, Sharon, Spencer, West, and Whyte—22.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THURMAN. Is there any motion now pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the motion of the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] to strike out section 1.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The vote upon this question of striking out the first section will of course, as it appears to me, determine the judgment of the Senate as to the propriety of paying this money to the government of Japan; and it was for that reason that I asked for the yeas and nays upon the motion. Striking that section out, it leaves only the question as to whether money in the nature of prize-money ought to be paid to the gallant sailors who, with the Wyoming and the Takiang, entered into the enterprise of attempting to open this strait. All that I wish to do now is to call the attention of the Senate to the extraordinary similarity between the provisions of this treaty of 1864 with Japan and those of the treaty of Washington of 1871 with Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain.

This treaty of 1864 provides that this money is received as a final settlement and disposition of all claims and reclamations in all respects as to the past transactions referred to between the four powers and the government of Japan. The treaty of Washington provides that whatever sum shall be awarded by the tribunal at Geneva shall be received as a final settlement and liquidation of all claims of whatever nature of the classes and characters referred to, which are in a large degree very analogous to, and in some respects the same as, those arising before that time against the government of Great Britain.

I do not think the remark of my friend from California [Mr. BOOTH] that we are bound to repay this money to Japan because she is a weak government ought to be considered quite in the sense that perhaps it might be, but which I am sure my friend did not intend, and that is that we ought to pay this money to Japan because she is weak. We ought to pay it to her, if at all, because we have received money that we had no right to receive, either for the reason that we exercised a power that we ought not to have exercised, or that we received it under a misunderstanding and in excess of what we were justly entitled to. Justice, I think, Mr. President, holds exactly the same sway between powerful nations as between weak ones; and if justice requires us to repay this money to Japan because the special and particular and personal injuries of our citizens that have appeared and have been proved are not equal to the sum she has paid, then in the same sense and in the same way, and under treaties having substantially upon this point the same language, justice would require that we should repay to Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain any sum in excess of what it shall have been proved that the private and personal and particular damage of claimants amounted to. It is no argument, I admit, and I am far from making it, that we ought not to do it if it is right; but it opens this grave and broad question: When between two nations difficulties and controversies and collisions have arisen for a long period of years, and as a final settlement of them all, so expressed in the treaties, a certain sum in gross is paid, if it fails afterward to appear that any particular citizen in a special and particular way has suffered and is entitled to redress, is the money unexpended for that special purpose to be returned? That is the question.

I can only say, Mr. President, because I do not wish to detain the Senate, that the justice and the honor that in this instance are supposed by my friend from New Jersey to require us to restore this balance would in the same sense and in the same way (which I do not myself at all agree to in either case) require us to restore to Her Majesty's government every dollar of the sum she has paid us that cannot be ascertained to be applicable to some special and particular and personal damage to some particular claimant.

I do not wish to be misunderstood. It is no reason why we should not repay this money to Japan because we may be obliged to repay money upon the same principle to the government of Her Majesty; but I do wish to say, and to call the attention of Senators to the proposition, that justice does not depend upon the question whether the nation from whom we have obtained money is weak or strong. Her scales are held aloft equally and fairly, and the strength or the character or the power of the respective parties has nothing to do with that simple and universal rule.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I wonder that my friend from Vermont when we seem about to vote should present a consideration calculated to exert an unworthy influence. He tells us at the same time that his suggestion ought not to have any influence upon us, because if it is right to pay back this money we should do so and not be deterred by consequences. Why, then, did he introduce the consideration?

Mr. President, there is no analogy between the cases of England and Japan. Great Britain is able to take care of herself. In relation to the Alabama award she had the first men of her nation to represent her, and they carefully considered the whole subject. The treaty laid down certain principles and rules, and then provided that the tribunal at Geneva could either refer it to an arbitration to pay specific claims, or pay the United States a sum in gross and be forever discharged, and the commissioners preferred to pay a sum in gross. It was a payment for the loss of national wealth measured by the losses of certain individuals who fell under these rules the treaty had established.

On the other hand this treaty was made when seventeen ships of war were in the waters of Japan. On the 8th of September they bombarded the rebel works, and on the 4th of October within the sound, if not at the mouth of the cannon, this treaty was demanded and obtained. There is little analogy between this case and that of Great Britain.

But, Mr. President, what does Japan owe us to-day? In July, 1863, they paid us all we asked. Our minister wrote in August, 1863, to Mr. Seward thus:

The indemnity demanded for the legation—

That is, for the burning of the legation at Yedo—has been paid. * * * The principal and interest of the Pembroke claim—has been paid. He wrote at the same time to Captain Price, of the Jamestown, as follows:

The Japanese government having arranged to my satisfaction the claims which I had been instructed by the President of the United States to make upon it, it is my pleasant duty to acknowledge the great assistance which you so promptly rendered me in bringing the negotiations to a successful termination.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What were those claims?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Whatever claims the President made. I do not know specifically what they were.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They were the claims of the Pembroke and the claims for the destruction of the legation at Yedo, and one or two other destructions of particular property of which Mr. Pruyn had made report as special instances of the destruction of public property in the case of the legation, and of injury to private property in the other cases.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I had just stated that payment had been made for the destruction of the legation at Yedo and for the damage to the Pembroke and for the claims made by the President. If our Government had any other claim, it should have made it. If we had any other claim then, what was it? No one has yet stated. We had also punished the insult to our flag. The rebels had fired into the Pembroke. We had sunk two of their ships; destroyed three hundred and fifty thousand dollars' worth of property; killed forty men. They had paid everything that we asked, and when we joined in a demand for $3,000,000 they did not owe us one farthing.

We hear of general damages, while the treaty shows that all that we had any claim for related to what took place in the Straits of Simonoseki. Indirect damages were never thought of. I believe there were none.

The main point made by the Senator from Vermont yesterday was that the rebellion was a sheer pretense; that in fact there was no rebellion. I will read from the Senator's remarks:

It was necessary, in order to meet the views of the people of Japan, that the treaties should be skillfully dodged and put off, and that one face should be held out to the foreigner, and that face should be, "We are unable to carry these treaties into effect, because our people are so rebellious and wrong-doing;" and, turning inland, say to the princes and to the people, "Just push on and make all the disturbance you can, and we can persuade these foreigners that the government has no power to let them in, and we shall get the advantage, while they will get the loss, and nobody will be the wiser."

I do not see how any one can read the treaty and the correspondence and come to that conclusion. It is a matter of history that in July, 1864, two or three months before this attack was made, the daimio of Nagato, Choshu, with whom, we are told, the government was in connivance, made war upon the Mikado at Kioto for seven or eight days; that all the troops were marshaled there to protect the sovereign; and the idea that at the same time the government was conspiring with the rebel is simply absurd. Two chapters of Adams's History of Japan are devoted to giving the details of the conflict between this Prince of Nagato and the sovereign; and yet my friend tells us that at that very time they were combined to cheat the treaty-making powers.

But to prove that Japan failed to carry out the treaty only because of a rebellion they could not subdue, I will not refer to "this double-dealing people," as my friend calls the Japanese, but to the treaty and to our own representatives. This short treaty of 1864, brief as it is, three times asserts that the trouble arose from the existence of the rebellion:

The representatives of the United States—

And the other countries—

in view of the hostile acts of Mori Daizen, prince of Nagota and Suwo, which were assuming such formidable proportions as to make it difficult for the Tycoon faithfully to observe the treaties, having been obliged to send their combined forces to the Straits of Simonoeski in order to destroy the batteries erected by that daimio for the destruction of foreign vessels and the stoppage of trade; and the government of the Tycoon, on whom devolved the duty of chastising this rebellious prince, being held responsible for any damage resulting to the interests of treaty powers, as well as the expenses occasioned by the expedition.

Again it twice refers in express terms to the rebellion. Thus it says:

Animated with the desire to put an end to all reclamations concerning the acts of aggression and hostility committed by the said Mori Daizen, since the first of these acts, in June, 1863, against the flags of divers treaty powers.

And again it provides that the sum paid shall—

Include all claims, of whatever nature, for past aggressions on the part of Nagato.

The letter of Mr. Pruyn, the letter of Earl Russell, and all the correspondence agree to the existence of the rebellion as a deprecated fact.

The Senator from Vermont also finds fault with the Japanese because they did not open their ports. They could not. They had opened the port of Yokohama and it had created great disturbance. They were responsible for the lives and property of foreigners who might come there, and such was the intense prejudice against foreigners and the excitement of the people that the government could not safely open the ports. They gave that reason to the United States for not performing the treaty, and our Government recognized the reason as just and said that they need not open the ports. Our minister, on the 28th of January, 1864, writes thus:

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES IN JAPAN,
Kanagawa, January 28, 1864.

By virtue of the power vested in me by the President of the United States of America, I, Robert H. Pruyn, minister resident of the United States in Japan, do hereby consent that the time for the opening of the cities and ports of Yedo, Osacca, Hiogo, and Nee-egata shall be and is hereby extended for the period of five years, dating from the 1st of January, 1863.

ROBERT H. PRUYN.

We recognized the fact that they could not safely open their ports; and, while the treaty required them to do so, the United States had respect to their situation and instructed our minister to waive the opening of the ports.

Mr. President, we are considering whether we shall hold $1,200,000 of the Japanese fund when we know that in 1863 they owed us nothing, and there is no evidence of their ever after that having committed an act of violence against the United States. All the expense that the United States incurred after 1863 was the expense of the charter of the Takiang and the fuel and ammunition incident to its employment, and that has been paid.

I have observed too—I cannot put my hand upon the correspondence—that the Japanese not only paid the United States their claim on account of the Pembroke affair, but also paid the owners of the Pembroke just what they demanded.

Mr. President, it is an easy thing to persuade people not to pay back $1,200,000; but if we retained the money it would be the dearest sum we ever held in our Treasury; and that, sir, is the verdict of the American people.

I remember this incident in history: Frederick the Great wished to make a beautiful garden at his home in Potsdam, and he directed his engineers and gardeners to lay it out. As they were making their surveys they came across an old mill. They told the owner they wanted him to surrender it. He said, "No; I have lived here all my life, and my fathers before me, and I intend here to continue to follow my pursuits." The engineers resorted to the sovereign and asked him for a royal order to remove the mill; but the great Frederick said, "No, let it stand; it will be worth more as a monument of Prussian justice than its removal will be in beautifying my park and gardens." And there it stands, constantly calling back the incident I have stated. So, Mr. President, the voluntary surrender of this ill-gotten money will be worth more to this nation as a memorial of American justice than any other use that can be made of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if my friend from New Jersey puts this on the ground of a pecuniary speculation, I do not know that I have anything to say. When he puts it upon that basis it is not a subject that I am disposed to enter into at all. The ground that I have taken is that this money was exacted, as in hundreds and thousands of cases between nations, if you call it an exaction at all, rather was paid in order to settle a long controversy of ten years' standing: the violation of the faith of treaties; the utter refusal, with fair words all the time, to do any one of the things that the treaty of 1854, the treaty of 1857, and the treaty of 1858 had provided should be done by the Japanese. A great public highway had been shut up for a year and a half, necessary not only to the commerce of the four powers with Japan, as far as they could have any commerce under such circumstances, but necessary often to the safe and convenient navigation of those great seas. That is the ground upon which I have put it, and when the Senator refers to the treaty of 1864 he will see that it declares in the first instance, not as a secondary or incidental thing but as the leading and primary object of this payment, that it was to cover and satisfy all reclamations between these powers and Japan for what had transpired in the past.

Now my friend says that he is surprised I should have introduced, apparently by way of indirect and unfair appeal to the sensibilities of the Senate, in the way of fear of consequences——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I said nothing about "unfair."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know that. A reference to the treaty of Washington and to the sum awarded by the Geneva tribunal. Mr. President, the first instance with which I am acquainted of that matter having been introduced into this debate was furnished by the Senator himself, who said yesterday, in this discussion and in the course of his very proper and very able remarks upon the subject, this:

But it has been urged—

I do not know who urged it—that if we pay back this idemnity money and it shall turn out that the claims brought against the Alabama award do not consume it, then we shall be obliged to pay back to Great Britain the residue of that award. If that result should follow, it ought not to deter us from doing right.

To that sentiment I most heartily accede.

But, sir, the claims against that award will consume it, and I fear that for many years after it is gone we shall be pressed to pay claims to be made under that award. The treaty of Washington was this: It fixed certain rules and principles, and then left it to the Geneva tribunal either to refer to arbitration specific claims or to pay the United States an amount in gross. They saw proper to pay us an amount in gross, which was indemnity for the loss of national wealth, that loss being measured by the losses of a certain class of our citizens included within the principles of the treaty. If they added two or three ciphers to the fifteen millions that they paid us, they would not have indemnified this country.

What they paid us and for what they paid us are to be ascertained by a reference to the treaty of Washington and by a reference to the award of the tribunal; and when you take the treaty of Washington, as I said a little while ago, and compare it with this treaty with Japan, the phraseology in respect of the sum paid being a satisfaction of all claims or reclamations growing out of the subjects referred to is almost identical; in substance they are the same. It follows to my mind, therefore, that we cannot escape from repaying to Great Britain, if she be a great power, able as the Senator said yesterday to show her teeth, (whatever that may amount to,) not because she will demand it, but because justice, if this be justice, requires it, whatever sum is left (as in this case, paying the Pembroke and certain particular damages) after paying the particular damages of individual citizens under the Geneva award, which will amount to about $8,000,000.

But I do not wish to be misunderstood, Mr. President. I did not introduce this question, although it is always well to look to consequences; but my friend from New Jersey, so far as I know, did. Certainly to my mind it appears to follow that if under the language of this treaty with Japan, it having turned out that the particular and personal damage which is capable of definite computation leaves a residue, we ought to pay Japan the balance, then in the case of Great Britain, when the particular and personal damage being computed and deducted leaves a residue, the same justice, the same honor, the same policy, if there be policy in such a question, would require us, not because it was demanded, but because we felt it to be a duty, to restore it.

My friend says that we have nothing to complain of about the opening of these ports, because, as he has read, Mr. Pruyn changed the treaty, and extended the time for opening half a dozen of these ports. It might be a curious subject of inquiry, if there was any object in going into it, where the President of the United States, or Mr. Pruyn, or both of them together, got their authority to change a treaty that had been made under the Constitution. I think it would puzzle the Senator from New Jersey exactly to discover the source of that authority. But I do not put it upon that ground only for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senate to the grave impropriety, as it seems to me, of the Executive of this nation undertaking in any manner to change, at his will and pleasure, what the Constitution declares to be the supreme law of the land, in the form of a treaty, without the consent of the Senate of the United States. This may have been a very small instance; but a very small instance sometimes makes a precedent for a very large and important one; and for one, endeavoring, so far as I may in my humble way, to preserve intact the symmetry and the strength of our constitutional government, I wish to enter a firm protest against the exercise of any such authority at all.

But to come to the practical bearing of the question, it may be said, and with considerable justice no doubt, that the Japanese did not know that the President of the United States had not any such authority and therefore as to them, in the mere moral sense, it must be taken as if he had. Grant it, for the sake of argument; what then? The Senator seems to put out of mind entirely the state of circumstances that had been going on for ten years. The President of the United States was only doing what we had all been doing, year after year being beguiled and deceived by what were held out to us as excuses for not carrying these treaties into effect; and when at last the thing could not be endured any longer, and an example was made in asserting the rights of the treaty powers by opening this highway, that belonged to the nations without any treaty, and the Japanese began to see that something serious was intended and was impending, we commenced to get at the facts. It turns out in respect of this very strait that this rebellious prince, so called, and it may be that he was, but in this respect this rebellious prince, was in correspondence, official correspondence, with the chief of the empire and was acting under the orders of the Emperor when he planted his batteries and closed up this sea highway.

When you come to the next step as to what had taken place at Yokohama, the Japanese representatives confessed that it had been convenient to play with us and with the other powers a double part. So it appears in the very documents and the very interviews where they as diplomats upon one side and our representatives and the others upon the other met for consultation. After that, I do not think it will do for my friend from New Jersey to say that anything we have in respect of evidence convinces us that this violation of treaties, from year to year persisted in and continued, was the inevitable and unfortunate consequence of a state of rebellion. Whatever rebellion there may have been respecting their internal affairs was very much like the story we have so often heard of the quarrel between the Irishman and his wife. When they were engaged in a very exciting combat with cudgels and fists, &c., some kind-hearted neighbor interfered and undertook to separate them and to restore the peace, when he found that they both immediately turned upon him and whipped him almost to death. This was exactly that case. Whatever internal difficulties and dissensions existed in Japan in respect of its internal policy, there was, as the documents show, an official and intimate and confidential intercourse between the princes who were called rebellious and the government in chief, in order to defeat the objects that these treaties had been made to attain. It was not discovered until at least just before the treaty of 1864 was made. It is significant, I think, that so far as we are advised this rebellion in Japan, if you can dignify it by that name, terminated just as soon as this treaty was made. We hear nothing more about the rebellion after that. Its object appears to have been accomplished, and the constitutional—if you can use such a phrase in respect of a government that has no constitution—the constitutional government of the Mikado was established and all was peace. I venture to say that if this application of force had been made five years earlier the rebellion, so called, in Japan would have terminated five years earlier.

That is the state of the case as, to my mind, the documents which we have before us make it appear. It may be that I am mistaken; but if I am not, it appears to me to follow as a matter of course that we have not received this money under any misunderstanding, under any undue exaction, but only as an accord and satisfaction for ten years of duplicity, and wrong, and injury, and violence inflicted upon the rights of the people of this country and of the other powers who united with us in exacting it. That is the state of the case. If, on the other hand, we have exacted it, extorted it, because we were strong and they were weak, having no ground of complaint against their conduct, that would be one thing; but unhappily to me there is not anything in any of the correspondence, either the British, or the Dutch, or the French, or our own, which has the slightest tendency to show any such thing.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I accept in all its breadth the rule that we ought to deal with Japan, though a weaker nation than ourselves, just as we would deal with any of the first-class powers of the earth. I would not pay Japan a dollar because that nation is weaker than we are; but if we have taken a dollar from that country by inadvertence that does not belong to us as a matter of justice and right, I would return it, and, because it happened to be weaker than we, on that account I would the more readily hasten to return it. It seems to me that because it is weak is not a reason why we should give them money; it is a reason when we have their money in our Treasury why we should be in a hurry about doing justice to a people who could not help themselves.

I insist that much the greater part of this money ought to be returned to Japan, because in very right and justice we are not entitled to it, and because, in my judgment, it is discreditable to this country to retain it a day longer than we can settle the grounds upon which it ought to be returned. The wonder in my mind is that this country has waited so long to do an act which, in my view, ought to have been done long ago.

From the time this discussion began I listened to it with a great deal of interest, for I was especially anxious to do justly, wisely, in casting my vote on the pending bill. Upon reading the report of the committee and like reports which preceded it from other committees and after hearing the exposition of the whole matter by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] I was about prepared to vote for the bill or one substantially like it. When, however, I heard the able and ingenious argument of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] on yesterday evening, taking the construction that he put upon the treaty and the various citations of fact which he read to us, I was very much impressed with what he said. I was then anxious to hear further discussion and to have some opportunity to look into the matter myself. Last night, employing as much of my time as I could in that respect, I looked through the diplomatic correspondence in reference to the Japanese indemnity fund, as he suggested to me and to others to do. I looked into the treaty and the grounds of the treaty, and I must declare that I never had a clearer impression about a proposition in my life than that the United States of America cannot keep this money without soiling its honor and doing a gross act of injustice to a nation that at that time was not able to help itself when it had to cope with such powers as this country, Great Britain, France, and the Netherlands.

When I come to scrutinize the argument of the honorable Senator from Vermont I find that it is built upon a false construction of the treaty and the grounds of the treaty under which the indemnity fund was exacted and paid. If I grant his premises he has reached a just conclusion; but that I do not grant. He has misconstrued, in my judgment, the treaty and misconstrued the grounds upon which it rests. He told the Senate in the course of his argument that this $3,000,000 was awarded for the purpose of indemnity for wrongs that had been practiced by the Japanese government toward the United States in treacherously and persistently perpetrating sundry breaches of more treaties than one, through a course of ten or fifteen years. His argument rests upon that broad ground. I insist that that is not true as a matter of fact. The correspondence to which he refers—and I cannot take time to refer to it now in detail—shows that the single transaction which was embraced by this treaty and upon which it rests was confined to what is referred to as having taken place in the Straits of Simonoseki. When we come to look at the treaty itself, it plainly indicates in terms and apt words of limitation that such was the purpose, and the correspondence which preceded and led to the treaty serves to make this, if possible, more manifest.

I beg to call the attention of the Senate to the language of the treaty, in order to show what it did embrace. Before I read the preamble, however, I want to call attention to one striking fact. This treaty was not made with the United States alone. The United States were not alone treating with Japan on account of special injuries done to the United States through a long course of years. This Government was treating with Japan in connection with the governments of Great Britain, France, and the Netherlands, and for injuries done to these combined powers. It was in reference to a matter wherein they were jointly interested, wherein they had been jointly injured; and that common injury alone was contemplated and intended to be redressed. It could not be possible, in the regular course of transactions of this character, that the United States could have been brought into a treaty covering a long course of injuries to itself, especially along with this one, which alone the other governments were interested in. Why should the United States treat about a long course of injuries to them, especially while making a treaty about a matter common to them and four other powers? That was not contemplated, but it was contemplated that by this treaty Japan should pay these four powers for special damages done to them in common. Any other view, it seems to me, is unreasonable, if not practically absurd.

I now direct attention to the preamble to this treaty, which I quote in support of the view which I have just submitted:

The representatives of the United States of America, Great Britain, France, and the Netherlands—

And mark these words; they are very material—in view of the hostile acts of Mori Daizen, Prince of Nagato and Suwo, which were assuming such formidable proportions as to make it difficult for the Tycoon faithfully to observe the treaties, having been obliged to send their combined forces to the Straits of Simonoseki in order to destroy the batteries erected by that daimio for the destruction of foreign vessels and the stoppage of trade; and the government of the Tycoon, on whom devolved the duty of chastising this rebellious prince, being held responsible for any damage resulting to the interests of treaty powers, as well as the expenses occasioned by the expedition.

By the express language used in this preamble, which is the key to unlock the meaning of the stipulations which follow, the matter embraced by the treaty was confined to what took place in that strait. What I now read follows up particularly the limitation in the preamble:

I read from the recital of facts in the treaty:

The undersigned representatives of treaty powers, and Sakai Hida no Kami, a member of his second council, invested with plenipotentiary powers by the Tycoon of Japan, animated with the desire to put an end—

Mark the words of limitation—to all reclamations concerning the acts of aggression and hostility committed by the said Mori Daizen since the first of these acts in June, 1863, against the flags of divers treaty powers, and at the same time to regulate definitively the question of indemnities of war, of whatever kind, in respect to the allied expedition to Simonoscki, have agreed and determined upon the four articles following.

The words of limitation intentionally confine the operation of the treaty to the transactions in that strait. The first stipulation is strikingly marked by the same words of limitation. It is in these words:

I. The amount payable to the four powers is fixed at $3,000,000. This sum to include—all claims, of whatever nature, for past aggressions on the part of—

What?

Whom?

Nagato—

The same prince who is mentioned by name in the preamble and in the recital which follows—

whether indemnities, ransom for Simonoseki, or expenses entailed by the operations of the allied squadrons.

In terms, the reference is to injuries done to the allied powers. I put it to any one who can understand the English language to say whether that treaty by its express terms is not confined to aggressions which were alleged to have been perpetrated in the Straits of Simonoseki? There is no reference to any aggression perpetrated anterior to that time or subsequent to that time. The $3,000,000 were agreed upon as indemnity for what happened on that occasion.

The Senator from Vermont says further that the authorities of Japan, the Mikado and the Tycoon, behaved treacherously toward this Government and had been doing so for many years. He cites what was said on the part of one of the ministers of state of Japan in an interview with the ministers of the combined powers who negotiated this treaty.

When you come to take what was said on that occasion altogether, it leaves this matter in a very different light from that which I gathered from what the Senator said yesterday. I will read more of what that minister of state said than the Senator did, in order to show exactly how the matter stands. After the transactions in the Strait of Simonoseki the ministers of the combined powers complained to the Japanese government, and at the suggestion of the ministers of that government a conference was held, in which it was suggested by the ministers representing the combined powers that the government of Japan, the Mikado and the Tycoon, were acting in conjunction with the prince who fired upon the Pembroke and who produced all the trouble in the strait and sought to close it against foreign commerce. The French minister said at that meeting that—

He was of opinion, in concert with all his colleagues, that the present was a very critical moment in the relations between foreign countries and Japan, and that the time had arrived for a total change in those relations.

Here I beg to call attention as I read these proceedings to the fact, that while the Mikado and the Tycoon were putting their government in relations with the Christian nations of the world, the masses of the people of the Japanese Empire were in a ferment on that account; and some of the subordinate officers and principalities were in open and avowed rebellion and the general popular sympathy was with those in rebellion. In fact, rebellion was rife in many portions of the empire; and it was exceedingly doubtful whether the government would be able to maintain itself. Foreign nations, Christian nations, were aware of this fact. They knew that the Mikado and the Tycoon were obliged to act very cautiously; that they must manifest some sympathy with the people, and give some ear to their complaints while they were negotiating with and opening their ports to foreign nations. Foreign nations and foreign ministers understood all this, and sympathized with them and recognized their condition. The French minister continues his remarks in that interview as follows:

Hitherto the foreign representatives had suspected that the Tycoon, under the pressure of many difficulties, had been led to play a double part, which, however calculated in one point of view to secure his safety, was on the other full of peril to the foreigners in Japan, and as they conceived not without some danger to himself. He had often seemed to be playing into the hands of the daimios most hostile to the maintenance of foreign relations, and to be seriously preparing to put a stop to these, while at the same time he professed to the several treaty powers a very earnest desire to maintain intact all the rights conferred by existing treaties. But now it was no longer a matter of suspicion but of certainty, and the documents placed in the admiral's hands prove that the whole of these outrages and flagrant violation of treaties by the Prince of Nagato were really the acts of the Mikado and Tycoon, since done under orders which might easily be interpreted to sanction, if not to prescribe, the exact order of proceedings adopted by the prince. The time, therefore, had come for dropping all mask and adopting a totally different policy; and unless the Tycoon, strengthened and materially aided as he must be by this complete victory over the Prince of Nagato and by such support as the foreign representatives were in a position to render him, would undertake without further temporizing to put himself in accord with the superior authority of the Mikado in this matter of the treaties, obtain his sanction, and give entire execution to all their stipulations, an opportunity not likely to occur again would be lost in the Tycoon's interest not less than theirs.

Takemoto Kai-no-kami, in reply—

This now is the Japanese minister of state there replying to that charge—stated that he fully agreed with the opinions just expressed; that this was a very critical moment, and it behooved the Tycoon's government to take advantage of it in the way indicated. In regard to the charge made by the Prince of Choshu and the written orders he produced in justification, he, Takemoto Kai-no-kami, had to remark—

You will remember that when the Prince of Nagato was overcome by the combined powers, he surrendered himself unconditionally, and said to the admiral that he was acting under the orders of the Mikado and the Tycoon. See what the minister says as to that. He says that he had to remark—

First. That the order, such as it was, had been transmitted, not by the Tycoon, but by an act of treachery on the part of persons about the Mikado, and without competent authority.

Second. That it did not order the prince to fire upon foreign ships—

That is, taking it to be true, taking it that that order had any force at all. He says further—

That it did not order the prince to fire upon foreign ships, and the proof that such was not its proper meaning might be found in the fact that although a similar order was communicated to all the other daimios, he alone had put that interpretation upon it, because it suited his own designs.

To this the American minister replied, that although it was true the order was not in express terms to fire, yet as it declared the intention of the Tycoon to cease all intercourse with foreigners on the 20th of June, 1863, the prince might naturally draw the inference that he was expected to treat them as enemies.

Takemoto replied, that such acts were contrary to the Tycoon's wish was further established by his sending down an aid-de-camp at once to cause the prince to stop firing, and this emissary was murdered in the territories of Choshu.

As to the appearance of double-dealing on the part of the Tycoon's government on the one side, concerting measures for the closing of the port of Yokohama, and, on the other, for maintaining the treaties in their integrity, the Tycoon had hitherto been, as the representatives well know, in a position to make something of this kind unavoidable in the interest of foreigners as well as for his own sake, since, had he openly refused to carry out the orders received from the Mikado for the expulsion of foreigners, he was liable to be deposed, and his dynasty might be destroyed. Now, however, that the Prince of Nagato had been defeated by the allied expedition, there was certainly a great opportunity for putting an end to whatever was ambiguous in the position of the Tycoon as regarded the foreign powers; but, in furtherance of such end, it was essential that the allied squadron should be recalled to prevent all chance of collision with other daimios and new complications arising.

So that, although the ministers of the combined powers did suggest in that conference that there had been treachery on the part of the sovereign and his generalissimo, the Tycoon, in reference to the transaction in the strait, this minister of state denied it squarely. He said that the orders were false orders, issued without proper sanction. Any one who will take the trouble to examine this correspondence preceding the treaty will see from reading the reports of the officers of the Navy that this rebellious prince in the contest in the strait did not exhibit the flag of Japan but his own flag, thereby indicating that he was fighting his own battle and avowing himself in open rebellion against his government. So far as the question of treachery goes, here are facts and circumstances and manifest motives going to repel the inference. The inference is far-fetched. It is entitled to very little weight—nay, nothing—when you come to apply to it the touch-stone of truth in the proper construction of the treaty and the correspondence that took place touching the transactions in the strait. If the treaty was based upon the transactions in the strait, and if it was intended that the government of Japan should pay for damages actually done there, what was the measure of damages? To determine that would require an account. The parties would have to ascertain that fact. Neither the Japanese government nor the ministers of the combined and allied powers were in a condition to ascertain the result at that time. Indeed the correspondence shows that the action on the part of the ministers was precipitate. They were importunate in their common demand for indemnity and redress. It is not going too far to say that the treaty was made at the mouth of the cannon. It was agreed upon under duress. Yes, I will go that far, for the circumstances warrant me in saying that. The Mikado was required to give his sanction to it in thirty days, else the implication was that the government of Japan must not only be subject to rebellions and internal dissensions, but must also expect these four of the mightiest powers on earth to make combined war upon it and crush it. The Japanese government could not choose; it was obliged in a time of legal peace to submit to the unqualified demands of Christian powers with which it was in peaceful relations, whatever might have been the conduct of some of its rebellious subjects. Rebellion at home, four of the mightiest powers on earth ready and threatening to make immediate war! The government was helpless and obliged to yield to demands for indemnity for acts it had not done. That is the whole of it and those are the circumstances under which this treaty was wrested from the Japanese people and $3,000,000 taken from them. Why, sir, the diplomatic correspondence shows that the ministers and officers themselves were ashamed of it, and their consciences were not easy and our consciences ought not to be easy about it this day.

I take it that our Secretary of State at that time probably knew more about the treaty and the transactions that led to it than any man in this country. He was a man well versed in statecraft; he was acquainted with that country and its history and our diplomatic relations with it. He was in constant correspondence with our minister there. He was fully posted upon the subject. He regarded the subject, no doubt, as was his duty, in every light; and now I wish to read to the Senate, as bringing the whole of this case within a narrow compass, what he said in a letter dated January 8, 1868, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What document is the Senator reading from?

Mr. MERRIMON. From the report made by the House committee on this very subject, May 20, 1872.

In a letter dated January 8, 1868, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of State (Mr. Seward) made this statement:

That, pursuant to the stipulations of the treaty with Japan of the 22d of October, 1864, to which the United States was a party, this Government has received from the Japanese government, without substantial equivalent, as its share of the indemnity stipulated to be paid by that treaty, the sum of $600,000 in gold.

All the installments at that time had not been paid. Since then they have been.

This amount has been invested in United States registered bonds, and awaits such disposition as Congress may direct.

So that we have his opinion, the opinion of our minister of state, who was best qualified to judge of what was done there, who, by his office as well as by his intelligence, was qualified and bound to take notice not only generally of those transactions, but of all their details, to the end that justice might be done and our rights secured, given to the committee of the House of Representatives and through them to us, this country, and the world, that these combined powers exacted $3,000,000 from those people, our share of which was received without any substantial equivalent. It is true that a merchant-vessel was passing through the Straits of Simonoseki, called the Pembroke, and was fired upon by the batteries of the rebel prince. The damage done, however, was slight, and as soon as it was ascertained, Messrs. Russell & Co., the merchants who were interested, made out their bill for the damage they had sustained. This they estimated at $10,000. Our minister, Mr. Pruyn, made demand upon the government of Japan that that bill be paid, and they did pay it. They disavowed any intentional offense to the Government of the United States; they disavowed the act of the prince whose officers had fired upon the Pembroke; they disavowed everything that he had done to our vessel of war. They not only disavowed the act; they disavowed any intentional insult, and made such apology as they could. If they had even done what was done intentionally, under the circumstances of that nation, peculiar as were their circumstances at that time, their apology ought to have been accepted by a noble and powerful Government like that of the United States. Under the circumstances they were entitled to great indulgence.

That first transaction—the firing on the Pembroke—was settled, and the Government of the United States then had no further claim on that account because of insult or damages, for the damages had been paid and there had been ample apology for the supposed or alleged insult and our war-vessel had chastised the rebellious prince severely. Nevertheless, the prince after that fired upon a French vessel, and again upon a British vessel, and again upon a vessel belonging to the Netherlands; and thereupon our minister—by what authority does not appear—entered into a conference with the foreign ministers of these three other powers, and they entered into an agreement, in pursuance of which they went to the strait of Simonoseki and demolished the batteries of this rebellious prince and compelled his unconditional surrender.

I ask here why did our minister feel called upon to join in that combination? There were no special circumstances moving him to do it. There was no consideration that I can see, except the great one of opening up that great country to the Christian nations of the earth, and I suppose he went upon that ground. But it turned out that our war vessel was so heavy that it could not be gotten into the strait, and thereupon he chartered a smaller vessel carrying fewer guns; and that vessel, thus chartered, bearing our flag and our officers and seamen, proceeded along with the vessels of the other powers to make the assault upon the batteries of the rebellious prince. In that contest our vessels did nothing; they did not join in that fight. It was not necessary that they should do so; but they were there giving moral aid and encouragement by their presence and our flag, and by virtue of this combination, entered into for the purpose of exterminating this rebellious prince, the allied powers claimed common indemnity and virtually compelled Japan to make the treaty mentioned.

After the prince was compelled to surrender, the negotiations began between the combined powers, these treaty powers, as they styled themselves, and the authorities of Japan. That government at that time was in great peril by reason of its own rebellious subjects and the insurrection that existed throughout the borders of its country. At that time, under the circumstances mentioned, when they were unable to help themselves, after they had disavowed the acts of this rebellious prince, when indeed they sympathized with the movement by which he was subverted and compelled to surrender, these combined powers demanded for the damages that they had sustained $3,000,000! First, they said among themselves they would demand but $2,000,000. They well understood that $2,000,000 would more than pay the damages; but after they had partially agreed upon $2,000,000, they said, "We will put the damages at $3,000,000, and if under the circumstances they cannot pay the whole amount, let them agree to open other of their ports to us;" it is expressly stated in the treaty that money was not the object, and that if the Japanese government would open two or three more ports with which these combined powers might trade, they need not pay any part of the $3,000,000. But even Japan would not submit to that humiliation. Weak as they were, distressed as that nation was by internal commotion, they said, "We will not submit to be treated in that way, and we will pay the money, however difficult it is for us to do so," and they did pay it, every dollar of it. Our part of it is under our control now; and with the accumulation of interest amounts, I believe, to about $1,400,000.

What were the damages that were done for which we claimed compensation? We could not claim damages for the firing upon the Pembroke; those damages had been paid. The vessel chartered cost $9,500 a month, and I think we had the vessel about a month. Very little damage was done. Upon that point I will not go into details, but I will read a paragraph from the same report from which I read a while ago. That report was made by Mr. Banks, a man, as we all know, of fine intelligence and who would give a subject of this sort the greatest consideration.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes sir.

Mr. DAWES. I want to call his attention to the peculiar phraseology of that clause in the treaty which the Senator has just mentioned. As it was stated by him and as it was stated frequently yesterday, the powers bound themselves to take the opening of a port instead of the $3,000,000. They bound themselves to take the opening of the port instead of three millions, if they wanted to do so. They did not bind themselves absolutely to take the opening of the port instead of the three millions, but they bound themselves to take the opening of the port instead of the three millions, if, when it was offered, they wanted it.

Mr. MERRIMON. Well?

Mr. DAWES. That is to say, they kept it all on their side.

Mr. MERRIMON. The treaty powers?

Mr. DAWES. The treaty powers. They kept it all on their side; they held out to Japan what has been stated here and what it would seem to me Japan would perhaps infer, that it was her option to pay the three millions or open the port; but it was not her option. It was her option to offer it, and it was their option after all to take it or not, just as they pleased. If the Senator will allow me to read it, he will see that these powers kept it in their own hands all the time.

Mr. MERRIMON. I shall thank the Senator to read it.

Mr. DAWES. This is the language:

> Inasmuch as the receipt of money has never been the object of the said powers, but the establishment of better relations with Japan, and the desire to place these on a more satisfactory and mutually advantageous footing is still the leading object in view, therefore, if His Majesty the Tycoon wishes to offer, in lieu of payment of the sum claimed and as a material compensation for loss and injury sustained, the opening of Simonoseki, or some other eligible port in the inland sea, it shall be at the option of the said foreign governments to accept the same or insist on the payment of the indemnity in money, under the conditions above stipulated.

It would not seem to me as if there was any need of any treaty stipulation to bind themselves to do it at their option. This is what these treaty powers solemnly bound themselves to; instead of this money which they said they did not want and would not take—for that was not what they were after—they solemnly bound themselves at their option to take the opening of the port in lieu of the money.

Mr. MERRIMON. And that view of the matter indicates something of a mercenary motive on the part of the allied powers; for after that the Japanese Empire became consolidated and rapidly became a growing commercial nation, and their ports were thrown open more or less, and they were ready, and have continued to be so, to put themselves in communication with all the world. Seeing this, these noble allied powers did not exercise their discretion and option and say, "Open your ports and we will forgive the money." No, they chose to take the money and the advantage of the open ports too! It seems to me, with all respect and submission to everybody who thinks otherwise, that is not very creditable to these great powers, not creditable to our country; and I want to see the stain wiped out, and I am ready and anxious to help to do it.

But, Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the actual damages sustained, and which it was said were embraced by this treaty. I am not able to go into details; I am not prepared to do it; and if I were, time will not permit; but I want to read upon that point a paragraph from the report that I referred to a while ago, made with such deliberation:

> It appears from this history that the indemnity fund was intended to satisfy "all claims of whatever nature for past aggressions on the part of Nagato, whether indemnity, ransom of Simonoseki, or expenses entailed by the operations of the allied squadrons."

There you see what the House committee said; and the gentleman who prepared this report took note of the limitations in the charter to which I called attention a while ago. I read further:

> The Government of the United States has already received a sum which, with accrued interest, amounts to more than $700,000. All claims for injuries sustained by this Government in consequence of the operations of Nagato do not amount to $40,000.

And yet we have of the money of the people of Japan $1,400,000 to-day. I read further:

> The expenses incurred by the Government of the United States by the participation of the chartered steamer Takiang, in the operations against Simonoseki in 1864, cost the Government only a few thousand dollars.
> The claim is, therefore, as stated by the late Secretary of State, Hon. William H. Seward, substantially without equivalent. It is confidently believed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, after a very careful consideration of the circumstances of the case, that the United States may wisely remit the unpaid installments of this indemnity fund without injury to this Government or the people. It is believed that such a policy will result in the establishment of more intimate relations between this Government and the government of Japan, and ultimately prove of great benefit to the commerce of the two countries and the progress of civilization.

In that, sir, I do most heartily concur. Having looked through the whole correspondence and examined as fully as I could into all the transactions that make up the basis of this treaty, and looked into the treaty, I indorse most heartily what is said in that report and what is said by the report accompanying the bill now under discussion.

What, then, is the duty of our Government? That is the serious question for us to consider now. In my judgment it is to return so much of this money as has been received by the Government inadvertently, and do it as promptly and as unconditionally as possible. I am not prepared to say that the Government ought to stultify itself by paying back every dollar, for there was some damage done which I take it under any circumstances the Japanese authorities would have agreed should be paid; but I put it upon the ground that the treaty was made hurriedly, without great consideration; no account of the damages was taken, and we have inadvertently received too much. We have received our share of the $3,000,000; we have had time and opportunity to ascertain what our damages were, and we find that they are comparatively trifling compared with what was supposed to be the fact at the time the treaty was made; and now it is our duty, having ascertained what they were, to reserve the amount necessary to pay the damages done to ships, the renting of the vessels, &c., and, if you please, to pay our gallant officers some compensation for their noble deeds on the occasion of the conflict in the strait, and to refund the balance as having been received by us inadvertently, to return it upon the ground that we have ascertained a mistake, that we took this money by inadvertence, that we did it hurriedly, and let us say that we are glad to return it, that we are not only bound in conscience, in justice, and in honor to do so, but it gives us great pleasure in the face of all the world to do this noble act of justice, only regretting that we have delayed to do it so long.

That is my view of what our duty in the premises is.

I think, sir, that the remarks of the honorable Senator from California, [Mr. BOOTH,] awhile ago, were eminently appropriate. He called the attention of the Senate to the condition of the people of Japan in the past. It was lamentable; it was deplorable. Instead of the allied nations boasting of their high civilization standing there and extorting this tribute at the mouth of the cannon, taking more than was due them, as they did, they ought to have been ready to sympathize with that people and to help them on in the high road of civilization and opening up their ports and their country to the voice and the benefits and the blessings of civilization. That ought to have been done; but by inadvertence it was not done, and I maintain that it is the solemn duty of the Senate now to do it and to do it promptly, and to authorize our Chief Magistrate, when he shall communicate with the chief authorities of Japan, to say that we do it, and do it cheerfully, paying them every dollar of interest, after retaining a sufficient amount to pay the damages that were actually sustained and such amount as ought to be paid to the officers and seamen who were engaged in the armed conflict in the Strait of Simonoseki.

I have deemed it due to myself, Mr. President, to say this much after what happened yesterday evening. I was anxious not only to satisfy my conscience, but to do exact justice to Japan and my own country; and looking at the whole subject I do not hesitate about the vote that I ought to give. It is a duty I owe my country, a duty I owe to common justice, a duty I owe to civilization, a duty that I owe to the people of Japan, a duty that I owe to myself and to God, to vote that this money shall be paid back to the people from whom it was taken by such inadvertence.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I have no very definite or distinct views to indicate to the Senate; but I have had an apprehension always, since I knew anything about this proposition, that the Government of the United States was in the wrong on this general question so far as having obtained a larger sum of money than was an indemnity for actual injuries suffered by the Government and citizens of the United States. With this general impression I listened with the greatest interest to the Senator from Vermont, not now in his seat, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who undertook yesterday to demonstrate that the Government of the United States had no more out of this negotiation than it could in good morals keep; that what it did receive was in the shape of indemnity for damages actually received. The method of the argument to vindicate that view of the subject is this, as I understand it: The Senator says that treaty stipulations for the opening of certain ports in Japan theretofore having been made, they were not fairly and in good faith kept by the authorities of Japan; that they did not open those ports, as we had a right to expect they would; and, our rights under the treaty having become absolute rights, their violation justified the authorities of the Government of the United States and of other powers interested in the general subject in taking the remedy into their own hands. That may not be questionable. That would be so undoubtedly if they did not keep their treaty stipulations to open the ports. If they did not, but obstructed their opening, then undoubtedly the Government of the United States might use the necessary authority to open them.

The proposition which the Senator from Vermont undertakes to maintain is that we got no larger indemnity than enough to cover the absolute damage. Now, aside from the fact that in the assault of the allied powers the expenses or damages to the Government of the United States were simply nominal, there are no actual damages proved in this case at all unless you consider that what might have gone under our prize-laws to the Wyoming for her gallant efforts in the year before may properly be charged over to the Japanese government. There does not seem to be any measure of damages, outside of what took place in the assault of the allied powers, which could be said to be a question of damages at all. In that view of the case it seems to me that the Senator from Vermont fails entirely to show us that the amount we did receive from the Japanese government was simply so much as we had suffered by reason of the ports having been blockaded and the passage-way referred to having been obstructed or blockaded.

It does not appear in this case whether our merchants had suffered particularly. They had been obstructed probably, but to what extent? What was the amount of damages arising from any such obstruction of the commerce of the United States? There is no evidence in this case. There might have been some inconvenience, but there has been no estimation, either public or private, upon that question at all, as I understand. It could not come into a question of damages. Therefore I come to the conclusion that the actual damages were nominal; that the amount fixed in the treaty was not named by those who negotiated it upon the estimation of actual damages at all; it was a gross sum, arrived at at a venture, either power and each power and all the powers undertaking to get enough out of that weak nation to hold her to keep the peace; and that was about all there was of it.

The Senator from Vermont complains that the Japanese had not acted in good faith, and he doubts exceedingly whether the daimio was not really advised by the Tycoon to do the very things that he had been doing; that is to say, obstruct this passage. I have not been able to ascertain how that is; but I doubt whether my honorable friend ought to feel bound to state that in the Senate of the United States. The Tycoon disclaimed the whole thing; he said that the daimio was acting in a rebellious manner. The daimio, to clear his skirts for aught I know and for aught we have any reason to know, denied it and said that it was connived at at headquarters. That may be so; but that is a matter of their own concern. We treated with them as an independent power, and it does not lie in our mouths, as it occurs to me, to question the good faith with which they acted; but if it were so it does not change the fact in this case one particle; it does not justify us in demanding of them an amount of damages beyond the actual amount we suffered; and I submit, so far as anything in this case appears, it was not anything at all like what we received. Therefore it seems to me that we are not only in the condition of having ascertained by our committee, but that it is patent to a cursory examination of this whole case that we have in our hands to-day an amount of money that in common honesty we cannot put into our pockets. It does not belong to us and it ought to be returned. That is the conclusion I have come to.

The argument of the Senator from Vermont is that we only received what we may in good faith keep; that we only got a sum of money which was just about equal to our damages, or which we received as an indemnity for what we supposed to be our damages. I maintain that on the face of the proceedings the evidence is exactly the reverse; that we did receive a larger sum than the parties to this negotiation believed they were entitled to. Let us see. The third section of the convention reads:

III. Inasmuch as the receipt of money has never been the object of the said powers, but the establishment of better relations with Japan and the desire to place these on a more satisfactory and mutually advantageous footing is still the leading object in view, therefore, if His Majesty the Tycoon wishes to offer, in lieu of payment of the sum claimed and as a material compensation for loss and injury sustained, the opening of Simonoseki or some other eligible port—

They will be very glad to take that in lieu of the money. In this very convention the idea is thrown out, "it is not the money that is sought; what is wanted is that you shall keep good faith." Now take that view in connection with the idea of compensation, and let us see what the minister who negotiated the convention said on the subject:

The British minister and myself—

Says our minister, Mr. Pruyn—

prior to meeting the Japanese commissioners, had agreed upon $2,000,000.

On what basis? They were there on the spot; and on what basis had they agreed on two millions instead of the three millions afterward demanded? Of course the supposition is that it was upon the nature of the case as it had been exhibited to them. They were on the spot. If it were a question of damage, they knew what it was, and they estimated it at two millions. Two millions they thought would cover the whole thing. Why, then, did they demand three millions afterward? Was it to cover the actual damages, or was it or not for another consideration entirely, and for a consideration which shows conclusively that we have got a large sum of money in our hands which we cannot keep?

The British minister and myself, prior to meeting the Japanese commissioners, had agreed on $2,000,000 as the sum to be paid, and would have had no difficulty in its division among the powers interested. But some difference was suggested as likely to arise from the considerations whether the moral support—whether the moral support afforded was not entitled to weight in such adjustment, and I did not feel that it was incumbent on me to interpose any objection to this view, as the moral support afforded by the United States was considerably in excess of the material support I was enabled to give.

The two millions would cover all the damages; but was it large enough to give all the moral support they wanted to extend to the transaction?—

That was the state of mind in which these men approached that subject. The material support which the Government of the United States had rendered was a mere trifle. They were not there in their own proper person. They had hired a ship, I believe, to carry the flag; so that they may be said to have been lookers-on. Therefore the material support was a very small affair; but the moral support, to wit, the flag which they held in the offing, was of so much consequence, or of so little consequence, in the estimation of the minister that he thought $2,000,000 would answer for that. The moral support which the British had given to this subject they thought required a larger sum. It is as apparent as anything can be that the $2,000,000 which was in the first place proposed everybody believed was adequate to all the material damages which had been borne in any way whatever. Mr. Pruyn then says:

I therefore readily agreed—

I therefore, not having given any material support and very little moral support except holding the flag in the offing, readily agreed—to the reference of this delicate question to the home governments.

That is, whether they should take more than two or more than three million or less. The argument of my honorable friend from Vermont was that this was the sum fixed upon to meet the actual damages, and therefore we own it; but the view taken of it then was that the actual damages were a very small matter, that any aid or comfort we had given in a material way was a mere trifle, and the moral support was the thing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator entirely, I think, misunderstood me, if by "actual" he means "special;" but if by "actual" he means the general damages to the commerce of the United States and to its citizens resulting from these ten years of the performances that took place there, then he is correct. In the ordinary sense in which I understand "actual damages," I do not think anything I said will bear any such interpretation. I certainly did not intend that it should.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I did not mean to limit the Senator's argument to any special damages, but I had already remarked, when the Senator was not in his seat, that I did not understand that any special damages were shown in the case in relation to our commerce. Whatever damages there might have been, so far as I know, so far as the papers disclose, are of an inferential character. A little further on Mr. Pruyn says:

I assented the more readily to the proposition of the envoy of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of the French to fix the amount at $3,000,000—because I thought it more likely to lead to the substitution of a port as a material compensation for the expenses of the expedition.

Instead of two million, for what?

And so to-day on that idea we are in the possession of a sum of money, our proportion of the difference between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000, simply for what? Not because it was a question of real damages, either inferentially upon our commerce or otherwise, but simply and wholly upon the idea that it might aid us in opening another port not stipulated for in the treaty. My honorable friend from Vermont talks about sharp practice and diplomacy and all that sort of thing. I should like to know what he would call this. I should like to know if our minister was influenced by these considerations and raised the sum from two millions to three millions and we took our proportion of it simply as a means, outside of the treaty and independent of the treaty, by which we could get the advantage of another port not provided for in the treaty, whether we can hold money on that consideration? No, I think not. That is exactly where the question stands.

The Senator from Vermont made an argument which certainly was ingenious. How much moral force it has in it I do not know. He said that this action might set a dangerous precedent; that we might be embarrassed by the fact of having a very large amount of money that we did not know what to do with, more than we could account for to Great Britain, growing out of the Geneva award. As I understood it, the cases are not alike in any sense whatever. Here was a settlement agreed upon in the way that I have shown. There was no estimate of damages; there were no specifications. Four great powers combined to intimidate and overawe, and they did do it, and demanded precisely what they chose, one of the elements being the moral effect it might have on future arrangements and negotiations. On the other hand, in the British case, if we have money left, it is the result of an arbitration, the judgment in law of arbitrators indifferently selected by both parties to adjudicate and determine upon a condition of things, which is conclusive and forever settled, the moral effect of which is altogether on our side. There is no parallel between these two cases at all. Does anybody suppose that in the great future of this country and of Great Britain there will be any desire on the part of Great Britain, in a diplomatic or any other view, to re-open that great question? How are the equities lying outside of the Geneva award? How do they lie in the minds of the American people and how in the minds of the English people? When that award was being made before the Geneva arbitrators, was Great Britain willing to open to that arbitration all the equities which might arise growing out of transactions to which she had directly or indirectly been presumed to give her consent and her aid and comfort? Certainly not. I hardly think that we are in any great danger of Great Britain having any desire to re-open the Geneva award.

On the whole I have come to the conclusion—and it is not a new notion with me—that we have got money here that does not belong to us. We received it under circumstances which probably at the time were well enough, but we got it under circumstances which were not a valid consideration to enable us to call it our own. Under these circumstances I shall vote to return it.

Mr. SARGENT obtained the floor.

EXHIBITION OF LIFE-SAVING APPARATUS.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator from California yield to me a moment?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is a resolution on the table which has just been sent from the House of Representatives authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to put on exhibition at the fair at Philadelphia a life-saving apparatus. If it is to pass at all it should pass now, so that there may be time to get it there. It is a very desirable thing to exhibit to the world, and I ask the Senate to put the resolution on its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) Does the Senator from California yield for that purpose?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate a resolution of the House of Representatives.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 110) authorizing the exhibition of a life-saving station at the centennial exposition was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri objects.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let it be read.

Mr. COCKRELL. Perhaps if I hear it read I may not object to it.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri withdraw his objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to make to the resolution now.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to place on exhibition at the centennial exposition, upon such ground as may be allotted for the purpose, one of the life-saving station-houses authorized to be constructed on the coast of the United States by existing law, and for which appropriation has already been made, and to cause the same to be completely equipped with all the apparatus, furniture, and appliances now in use at the respective life-saving stations of the United States, the building and apparatus to be removed after the close of the exposition and re-erected and used for a life-saving station at the place authorized by law.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAPANESE INDEMNITY FUND.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 626) in relation to the Japanese indemnity fund, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. SARGENT to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I trust that it will not seem unfashionable, after the speeches which have been made, to express some wish that, if there is a reasonable and decent ground to retain in the Treasury of the United States $1,200,000 worth of gold and apply it to the payment of our national debt and so far relieve tax-payers, it may be done, and that I may be permitted to insist that possibly there are some reasons why this should be done. I am afraid that if we apply the principle which is sought to be established by this bill it will be necessary for us to review our dealings with other nations and make them compensation for wrongs which we have done to them. In the course of our history, within the recollection of every one who hears me upon this floor, on a pretense of our own seeking, upon our own provocation, we went to war with a weaker power; we falsely asserted that that war was commenced against us by the republic of Mexico. We sent our troops, armed and equipped and backed by our superior civilization, to this weaker neighbor, a republic struggling under adverse circumstances to justify itself and its existence. We beat down its armies, destroyed its military power, occupied its capital, prostrated it in the dust, and thus holding it to the earth by our superior power, after an unjust and false pretense of war, and a waging of war in the bitterest manner against that republic, thus humiliating it, we compelled it to make a treaty whereby, in consideration, as the treaty says, of some money, which we paid to them, a mere bagatelle in proportion to that which we took away from them, we required them to cede California, New Mexico, Arizona, Nevada, and a part of Colorado and Utah, and other Territories. We required of them to cede territory which at that time, at its then valuation, to any nation on earth would have been one hundred times the amount of indemnity which we pretended to give them for it. We did this by the strong arm, and if we now are to return to another nation, because it is weaker, and because it is trying to struggle toward the light, an amount which was exacted in this Japan case, we ought either to return the territory or a part of it which we received from Mexico, or make just indemnity for it. If we are robbers in the last instance, and have in our pockets ill-gotten gains, we were robbers in the former instance and upon a scale of much greater magnitude. Are we prepared to give back and return any of our territory which we took from Mexico?

My friend from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] who has just spoken has put this case upon the ground that by our power we took advantage of this struggling people, wrested from them money to which we were not entitled, and therefore we ought to return it; that it is money which ought to burn in our pockets. Representing a portion of the territory acquired from Mexico, I should be very sorry indeed to have California ceded to Mexico and should resist it; but if the principle of this bill were adopted the Senate could not logically refuse to make reparation to Mexico by giving it some millions, proportionate to the value of the property which we wrested from it under circumstances very similar, as is alleged, to those under which we took this indemnity from Japan.

That is not the only pretense that I have heard urged here. There is a strange inconsistency among the supporters of this bill. My friend from Maine says that the flag was shown in the offing; that there was some moral support, but no material support; that the moral support did not amount to much, in fact amounted to nothing at all. On the other hand other supporters of the bill make a different showing. My friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] insisted yesterday that the American sailors there fought gallantly and distinguished themselves in one of the great actions of the world; that with six guns they fought one hundred and thirty, or thereabouts; that with a few men they fought twelve hundred; and that it was a gallant battle, illustrious to the American Navy and illustrious to the men who participated in it. As it is true that both gentlemen support the bill for the reasons they gave, it seems to me there ought to be some correspondence or conference between the supporters of the bill and let them agree upon some single system of support. If the Senator from Ohio is right, if our sailors were legitimately called upon to fight and fought so gallantly and so gloriously in order to vindicate the rights of the United States, those of course are the only acts which he now would have any right to vindicate; the only quarrel in which we could interfere with any propriety; in that case the Senator from Maine is wrong and the theory of the bill is wrong so far as it would return this money to Japan.

I do not believe that this money was improperly obtained. In matters of this kind it is impossible to lay down a particular rule of damages. In most cases of damages before courts rules are impossible, and the whole case is left to the discretion of the jury. Punitive damages are often given beyond the actual damage. It is left to the discretion of the jury, and sometimes courts advise that it shall be done simply because it is impossible to estimate the injury to honor and sometimes even to estimate injury to property. The value of an heirloom to a person in whose present possession it is, if destroyed, cannot well be estimated, and would seem certainly to be greater than the amount at which it might sell at auction if put up at a forced sale, on account of the value to the person who owned it at the time it was injured or destroyed. The rule of damages is entirely uncertain and rests very largely in discretion. Here is a case where there certainly was damage done to our commerce. How much it is is not distinctly stated. There was some disregard of our national rights; otherwise our fleet had no business there. Our officers did go there, and, as the Senator from Ohio insists, they fought gallantly in order to stop a state of things detrimental to the public interests. As the result of it there was a treaty and a certain amount of money was sent here which has been put into a fund instead of going as it should have gone into the United States Treasury.

The better way would have been to have adopted the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] That amendment was voted down. That would have put this money into the Treasury, and it is better in all such cases that the money should be put into the Treasury in the first instance instead of being hung up as a purse is hung up in a horse race, as a temptation for the cupidity of all persons who desire to participate in its contents. It is tempting for every one who can possibly produce some pretense under which it or some portion of it shall be devoted to him. Such money should be put in the Treasury of the United States, and then, if we owe honest debts to any person or if we are moved by sentiments of generosity toward any one, we can make the appropriation directly out of the Treasury of the United States. That is a much more careful system and by it we avoid extreme waste. There seems to be an idea that as this is a fund not in the Treasury, but represented by bonds and set aside by itself, we are not appropriating the public money lavishly to any one who desires that money by distributing it among those who come forward and ask to share it. It is a bad system in every form, and it would be better if this fund had gone into the Treasury of the United States originally. If it had gone there I doubt if missionaries in Japan would have been writing here to Senators and telling them, "We have a school system which we want to support here among the Japanese; if we can get this money away from the Government of the United States and have it sent back to the Mikado, we may induce him, probably, to give part of it or the whole of it for the purpose of sustaining our schools." There is always an element of selfishness at the bottom of these things, if we can only come at it. There is a desire to extend and enlarge the power of those schools, which is meritorious. I have no doubt these gentlemen are excellent men; but there is at the bottom of it a selfish motive. The proposition really is to take money that belongs to the Treasury of the United States for the support of schools in another country. There have been no representations made to us by Japan which I have been able to discover, by their minister or through any other source coming through the Japanese government, that they want this money returned or would be glad to get it back.

It has been very well insisted on this floor that it places Japan in an ignominious position for us to offer it. We say to them, "You are weak. You were weaker than we were and we squeezed this money out of you. Our conscience, however, troubles us, and we ask you, the weak person, to take it back." I believe myself that it places Japan in a humiliating position. If Great Britain, as the result of a treaty between us after a war, had exacted from us an amount of money which we had paid, I do not believe that we would receive the money back from Great Britain. We would be apt to throw the gift back in the faces of those who offered it. We would consider it, it seems to me, as unworthy of our national dignity, accompanied by the humiliating proposition that we should take back the money which we had given at the point of the bayonet and which had been given by us as a result of a treaty, by reason of our being overruled or by any reason whatever. We would reject any such proposition if it were applied to ourselves, and I have no doubt that the government of Japan so looks upon this matter. If we and the other nations who participated in the convention had injured them and ought not to have received this money from them, and if they had a right to get it back and wanted it back, they would have made their representations known through the State Department. Unquestionably they would have communicated with our Government on the subject. They have made no such proposition. The initiative, I understand, comes from another and a different source. It comes from those who expect to receive the benefit of this fund. It is another method of securing it. I have nothing to say against the purpose for which possibly it might be applied if received by Japan; but that is very doubtful. I still say that back of it there is a motive which has its basis in selfishness, in a selfish desire of seeing certain school institutions prosper in Japan, in whose success certain men are interested. I do not think the motive is adequate. I do not think we ought to apply it for any such purpose.

I have an idea, after the vote which has been taken, that it is useless to protest against this money being offered to Japan. I regret that such is the case. I think it is honestly in our possession and ought to be applied as moneys received from miscellaneous sources usually are applied, to the extinguishment of the public debt and in relieving the people from the burdens of taxation under which they lie. It has been urged on this floor over and over again that business is stagnant in the country; that men are without work; that families are reduced to poverty. We hear the cry come up here from the western prairies. I know that it is true to a certain extent along the Atlantic coast. Nevertheless, in order to maintain the national credit, to pay the interest as it accrues upon our immense public debt, and keep good our sinking-fund, to pay the necessarily large expenses of administering the Government, we are compelled to keep up our taxes and even to look for new sources of taxation. Under these circumstances, after years have elapsed, it is proposed to pay it back with all its accumulations and deprive the Treasury of the substantial benefit which it would have if it were used for the general public interests. I do not think that it is wise to do this. I do not think that justice requires it. I think that justice to our own people requires that we should not so act.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hope not; I hope the friends of this bill will stand by it until it is passed.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from California to amend the bill by striking out the first section.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I shall not vote for the motion of the Senator from California. Having listened to the whole of this debate without desiring to participate at all in it myself, I am satisfied from what I have read in reference to this fund, as also from all the arguments that have been made, that we required of Japan a much larger sum of money than in conscience we ought to have demanded. It is now in the Treasury, held as a separate fund, and I am in favor of restoring it to the power from which we extorted it. I am not governed any more in this feeling by consideration for a weak and helpless power than I am by the high regard and respect I have for the Government under which I live. Though Japan may be a power which we can afford to treat with indignity and from whom we could afford to extort moneys which she did not owe us, yet, as an honorable, high nation of the earth, one of the highest powers on the earth, we owe it to our own character, we owe it to the dignity of our own country, if there is a single dollar in the Treasury of this country that belongs to any other power, forthwith to return it, and, I had like to have said, with usury.

Mr. COCKRELL. How about the claims of our sailors for prize-money?

Mr. SAULSBURY. That is a part of the fund we are entitled to hold. We are entitled to hold enough to indemnify our own citizens, in accordance with usage, because of the part which they took in these actions. I believe it is not intended to return the whole fund, but to retain in the Treasury of the United States enough to indemnify the Government for all expenses and all outlays incurred by the Government, and also to distribute to the sailors engaged in opening that channel the proper prize-money to which they are entitled under the customs of the country on such occasions. Every other dollar which we have extorted I would return. I use the term "extorted" designedly. We had the power and used it. We put into our own coffers money which in good faith and conscience we ought never to have demanded and ought never to have received. Having it there, we should imitate the men who are to-day sending to the conscience fund the money of which they have wrongfully deprived the Government. We should take this money at once from the Treasury. We should not have our national character compromised by any idea that we are holding in the Treasury of this country one dollar that in justice and equity belongs to another, and especially to a weaker power.

In regard to the appeal of the Senator from California in behalf of the maintenance of the credit of this country; that we are bound to maintain the credit of this country; that our resources are taxed for that purpose, and that we are seeking new avenues of taxation in order that we may pay the public debt and maintain the credit of this country, its honor and dignity, I say we must maintain the honor of this country, but we must not do it by taking from other people that which properly belongs to them. I am in favor of upholding and maintaining the public faith toward all the nations of the earth and toward the bondholders of the Government; but I am not willing, in order that that may be done, to put my hand into the pocket of any other people and take from them that which belongs to them.

I therefore shall vote against the motion of the Senator from California to strike out the first section, and when the proper time comes I shall vote to refund to the Japanese government every dollar which properly belongs to them.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I have listened to this debate with a good deal of interest and with considerable profit, I hope. I am rather inclined to think I might be induced to go for either of these sections separately, but taking them both together it is a dose that I cannot swallow anyway. When I listened to the honorable Senator from New Jersey and to the honorable Senator from Delaware, who has just taken his seat, as they inveighed against the propriety and the honesty of our wresting from a weak power their hard-earned moneys and applying them to our own uses, I felt that we might be in rather small business not to return the excess of cash which is said to be in our Treasury, and which was paid to us by Japan; and when I listened to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] who tells us in vivid terms of the gallant exploits of our Navy, especially of his old friend and school-mate, McDougal, I feel as though we were called upon, or might be, as an act of gratitude, to vote a gratuity to the officers and seamen who so gallantly carried our flag in those distant waters and maintained the prowess of the American Navy. They do not exactly come within the law of prize; but we ought to give them some money as a testimony of our gratitude. It is a pretty strong argument; there is considerable to be said on that subject; but the difficulty I have is to justify to myself as the representative of an honest nation the propriety of taking Japanese funds to pay bounties to the American Navy. I cannot reconcile the two propositions. It does seem to me as if the Senator from Kansas now in the chair [Mr. INGALLS] uttered the other day a truth to which we ought not to turn a deaf ear, when he said that either this money belongs to the United States or to Japan. If it belongs to Japan we ought to return it to Japan without any abatement for the purpose of paying gratuities to any portion of our Navy. If it belongs to us, put it into the Treasury, and then if any portion of our Navy have claims upon the Treasury, make an appropriation to meet those claims.

The difficulty of reconciling these two sections led me to consider a little each one of them. I rather think, Mr. President, when you go to the bottom of this matter, that you cannot make a very good case in defense of either of these sections. If Senators will just confine themselves to the first section alone, I think it will bother the best informed of them to state any good reason why one dollar of that money should be repaid to Japan. Senators say that we have paid every claim already which could be preferred against the fund, and we have an excess. If any Senators suppose that that money was paid to us in trust for any individual or any number of individuals in the United States, they make an immense mistake, or at least I am mistaken if they are not. I have seen no evidence of that whatever. It was paid to four nations to be divided between them as they should agree, and neither one of the powers held a dollar of the fund which might be given to it and appropriated to its share, in trust for anybody in the world. It seems that this Government came to the conclusion that there were certain citizens who had been subjected to losses which ought to be made good out of this fund, and it has made them good; but it was not paid to us because those citizens had made losses. It was a gross sum paid to these four powers, not for property destroyed, not for this specific wrong or that, but for what was claimed to be a long system of aggression upon the rights of the powers. The firing upon the Pembroke in 1863 was only one of those aggressions, and by no manner of means the greatest of them or the worst of them; and if we were not entitled to this full sum of money in the court of conscience by anything which Japan had done, any wrong to us prior to 1864, I think any Senator who will very casually and cursorily look over our diplomatic correspondence since 1864 will come to the conclusion that if we could charge a decent price for every wrong done since that time against us by Japan we should not only use up any excess there might be of the fund but there would be a large balance due us. Your diplomatic correspondence is full from that time to this, the whole twelve years, of complaints of the misconduct of Japan.

I do not propose to dwell at all upon this point. It is the second section that exercises me most. The idea of paying prize-money to the crews of the Wyoming and of the Takiang seems to me to be the last proposition that ought to be brought into the Senate. If it was a proposition to pay it out of our Treasury, I should think it was about the last proposition that ought to be brought here; and, if it is a proposition to pay it out of the Japanese treasury, it is more startling still. The truth about it, I suspect, is that, if Senators did not feel that we were bound to return to Japan what Japan had really no business to have, there would not be a Senator on this floor bold enough to propose to pay a bounty to the crews of the Wyoming and the Takiang; but, inasmuch as this money is likely to go back to Japan, perhaps we had better snatch a little of it for the crews of these two vessels. That is the idea, I suppose. I would not let it go back, and therefore I would not snatch any of it.

What were the services for which we are asked to appropriate $125,000 out of this fund? The Wyoming rendered some service, it is true. She was ordered to chastise one of those daimois, or governors, or princes, or whatever they ought to be called. She went to her duty promptly, executed it fully; she was engaged there an hour and ten minutes; she actually lost four men, who were killed during the engagement, and one died afterward; she was struck by the enemy's shot several times. Your Secretary of the Navy said it would cost $9,000 to repair the damages to the Wyoming. There was so much money sacrificed in that engagement and there were five lives sacrificed. That was the work she did. It was police work, to be sure. There is a little difficulty in bringing this vessel within the laws of prize. There are two difficulties; one is that there was not any war and the other is that she did not capture any vessels. Nevertheless there was some work done; and if you want to pay for it I have not any particular objection to your voting a bounty; but when it comes to voting a bounty to the officers and crew of the Wyoming and taking it out of the Japanese fund, that is very bad. The Takiang, I understand, was a merchant-vessel; she was hired, crew and all, to take our flag up the Straits of Simonoseki. You had not a vessel of war to send there, and it was thought that our flag should go up there; whether you did any fighting or not, that you should be represented on that solemn occasion. The force was furnished by the Netherlands, France, and Great Britain. Two expedients were suggested for the purpose of getting our flag up there. You had a vessel that was unfit for sea service, I believe, the Jamestown; she could not go to sea; but the commander of the British fleet proposed, in order to get our flag up there, to take her in tow and tow her up, but it occurred to them that might embarrass the operations——

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would be untoward. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWE. That would be embarrassing, and finally your minister hired this vessel, the Takiang, crew and all. She was to go up there for thirty days, at a sum, I believe, of $9,000; but, as she was not a vessel of war, as her purpose was only to carry the flag to show that her instructions were to keep out of all harm. They put an American officer on board of her, a lieutenant I think from the Jamestown, to take command. She went up there. The reports say that she disregarded her instructions. Having a gallant officer in command, I suppose he began to think when he saw other vessels belching forth their fire that really he was in command of a vessel of war himself, and they say he did fire eighteen shots himself out of a gun that he took on board from the Jamestown when he started. I believe the Navy Department estimates the value of those shells at $250. There was not anybody killed on the Takiang nor was anybody wounded. The wounded from other vessels were brought on to the Takiang, and I have no doubt were taken good care of. That is what that vessel did. The men on her, with the exception of the few taken on board by the officer of the Jamestown, were the regular crew of the vessel. They worked for so much a month. That is what she did, and it is seriously proposed here to pay something like prize-money for that exploit to the officer in command of that vessel and to the crew who sailed on her, and it is said not only to pay them money but to steal the money from Japan to pay them with.

Mr. President, my conclusion is that each of these propositions on the whole is a very lame one considered by itself. Put them both together and they are helplessly lame. I shall vote therefore for the amendment of the Senator from California, which is to strike out the first section. I shall vote for it for two reasons: first, because I think it is a pretty good amendment in itself; and, secondly, because I think it will make it so much easier to strike out the second section.

Mr. BOGY. I shall detain the Senate but a moment. The subject has been so well discussed already by gentlemen on both sides of the question that I only rise because I am a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and it is understood by some persons on the floor that the committee is a unit on this subject. I myself believe that this money should not be paid back to Japan. I have not been able to find a single reason why, but, on the contrary, I see a great many reasons why it should not be.

With the internal political condition of Japan we have nothing to do. We recognize Japan, as the fact is, as one of the nations composing the family of nations of the world, a nation not destitute of civilization by any means. Their civilization is not perhaps like ours; but nevertheless they are a civilized people, and they are advanced in civilization, and are perfectly able and competent to take care of themselves. There can be no question about that. That being so, they entered into a treaty with four other nations of the world by which they agreed to pay a certain amount of money, not an amount of money limited to the damages which had been created by the vessels going into the straits, the name of which I do not now remember, but damages growing out of the wrong-doings of Japan, damages growing out of the fact that Japan, in violation of the well-known law of nations, had closed a strait leading from one sea to another where the commercial nations of the world had a right to pass at all times and without treaty. It goes beyond treaty; it is a recognized law of nations that they have such right; I speak of commercial nations. Japan, in violation of this fundamental right, a right which belongs to all the commercial nations of the world, closed this sea and for the time being disturbed the commerce of the world, to what extent we cannot say. It will be impossible at the present day to estimate the damages sustained by any American merchant or a French merchant or a merchant of the Netherlands. That cannot be done. But the fact is that the commerce of the nations of the world was for the time being arrested by the conduct of Japan. Whether that was by one of its subordinate princes is neither here nor there. We have nothing to do with that question. We hold the head, the nation responsible, represented by a gentleman called, I believe, a Tycoon; but whether he be a Tycoon or a Mikado is neither here nor there; he is the chief of the nation, and as that chief he speaks for that nation.

The commerce of the world to the extent of this narrow strait having been disturbed by the doings of a prince of the empire of Japan, damages of course are inflicted upon commercial nations of the world; to what extent we have no means now of ascertaining. It is very possible that some enterprising merchant might have carried more than one valuable cargo across that sea who did not undertake it, because he knew that it could not have passed. Therefore you cannot ascertain the damages. But damages are not always specific in amount. There are damages imposed upon a nation, as they are imposed upon an individual, by the way of a fine for wrongdoing. Japan did wrong here. Let that be as it may, as a mere matter of common sense this nation makes a treaty with other nations not alone to pay the damages incurred to the vessel that went up that strait with a view of opening that sea to commerce, but the very words of the treaty show exactly what was the intention. Here are the words:

The representatives of the United States of America, Great Britain, France, and the Netherlands, in view of the hostile acts of Mori Daizen, Prince of Nagato and Suwo, which were assuming such formidable proportions as to make it difficult for the Tycoon faithfully to observe the treaties, having been obliged to send their combined forces to the Straits of Simonoseki in order to destroy the batteries erected by that daimio for the destruction of foreign vessels and the stoppage of trade—and the government of the Tycoon, on whom devolved the duty of chastising this rebellious prince—

Not for damages; but for "the stoppage of trade"—

As a matter of course it was his duty to do it. He failed, because perhaps he was not able; but that is not our business. He did not do it. That is sufficient for us—being held responsible for any damage resulting to the interests of treaty powers, as well as the expenses occasioned by the expedition.

The arguments of the Senators who are in favor of returning this money to Japan are confined alone to the immediate expenses attending the expedition, the losses resulting from the damage sustained by the vessel or vessels that attempted to go through that strait. This is a broad mistake. It is for damages resulting to the interests of the treaty powers. What are those damages? I dare say that the six hundred and odd thousand dollars received by the United States are not a sufficient indemnity for the loss which the trade of American merchants received in that sea, because it was not confined alone to that locality. By destroying the trade in that locality for the time being, you more or less affect and destroy the American trade with all the Empire of Japan, making it all uncertain, making it extremely dangerous, and the consequence is that your enterprising merchants will not sail from the coast of our country to that country, fearing that they may be involved in ruin; and, as far as mere damage is concerned, the six hundred and odd thousand dollars will not indemnify the people of this country.

Again, the first section of the treaty says:

The amount payable to the four powers is fixed at $3,000,000. This sum to include all claims, of whatever nature, for past aggressions on the part of Nagato—

For "past aggressions." What are they? Those people have been aggressing on American commerce in one way or another from time immemorial. Many, many Americans have been prevented from trading with that country, and have suffered immense loss from time immemorial. It is to cover these losses also—whether indemnities, ransom for Simonoseki, or expenses entailed by the operations of the allied squadrons.

So that it was not alone the expenses incurred by the operations of the squadron, but for all past aggressions, for interfering with commerce, for preventing commerce from going through where it had a right to go, not only by treaty, but a right to go by the law of nations, treaty or no treaty.

I attach no importance, Mr. President, to what I have heard said by Senators on this floor, that Japan being a weak nation we ought to be magnanimous. I hold the rule of justice to be the same whether it be Japan, or Mexico, or any other nation weaker than ourselves that we are dealing with. We must do justice. When a treaty has been made with a civilized power of the world, it is a contract that must be binding; and to go back and discuss that subject over again is not wise, and instead of being productive of good is productive of great mischief, and is not calculated to maintain the peace of the world. The peace of the world is maintained by compacts and treaties made with nations, and when they are made they are binding; and we do not look to the past; the past is to be forgotten, and we start de novo from that point. Here we made a treaty, by which a very small sum of money was to be given to us. It is possible a less sum might have been paid for mere damages. It is possible also that the commissioners were willing to take two millions, and that it was increased to three millions because their object was to get a sort of leverage upon the people of Japan to obtain another port for commercial purposes. That also is all right. If it was necessary to increase the damages so that the commerce of the world would have one more port, why should it not be done? It is a great commercial advantage, and the nation that will stand aloof and use a portion of God's earth exclusively and not allow others to go there ought to be forced to open all its ports to the commerce of the world. It owns no territory to the exclusion of the rest of the human family. It ought to be forced to open its ports to commerce.

I say then, without dwelling at length on the subject, that I have not heard a single reason to convince me that we should return one cent to Japan. I furthermore have very great doubt whether we can take any of this money and pay it to the officers and sailors in that expedition; yet I am willing to vote for that under the circumstances; but surely I cannot vote to pay a sort of prize-money to our officers and sailors if the money belongs to Japan. If it be true that this money was wrested from that empire unjustly, because we were stronger than they, we ought not to retain a single dollar of the money; and, if we wish to be generous, let us not be generous with the money of Japan. It is not consistent. The whole should be returned, excepting the few dollars necessary to pay the mere expenses of the expedition there, or the whole should be retained; and in retaining it I am willing to vote for a small sum as a sort of a prize-money to the sailors and officers, although I doubt very much whether they are entitled to it. I have no hesitation in saying that I do not think it was such a great feat of valor as calls upon us as a nation, willing at all times to reward its brave soldiers on sea or on land, for special recognition; nevertheless I have no objection to giving it to them; but I am unwilling to give one cent back to Japan. It will do us no good and I think will make us contemptible, and, if I were the Tycoon of Japan, when the money was offered to me I would return it with contempt to the people of the United States.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I shall be controlled in the vote I shall cast on the measure before the Senate by a very few considerations. The United States claimed to have suffered damages from the government of Japan. That led to negotiations. Those negotiations resulted in a treaty. That treaty was presented by the President of the United States to the Senate for its action. It was ratified and confirmed by the Senate, and thereby became a part and parcel of the supreme law of the land.

The effect of this bill is to-day that the claim of the United States was, if not fraudulent, extortionate; that the great powers of this Government were brought to bear to crush out a weak government and extort from it money to which we were not justly entitled; and that when that treaty was entered into it was procured by force and by duress, and not in justice and good faith; and that the President of the United States was a party to this transaction and that the Senate of the United States were parties to the transaction. We go before the world in this way as having secured from a weak government money to which we were not honestly and justly entitled.

Now, sir, I believe in supporting the honor and character of this Government, and believing that all things done by the proper authorities, by the officers appointed by the Government, are rightfully and solemnly done, believing in the verity of the record, I propose to stand by the record until something is brought forward to show that that record was procured by fraud. Nothing of that kind has been done. I shall not support this bill.

I cannot see how one who has the honor and integrity of this Government at heart can sustain the position which is taken in this bill. Besides, if this treaty can be opened now for the reasons which are assigned in this bill, every treaty which the United States Government has entered into or may hereafter enter into may be opened for the same reason, and it would be a most dangerous precedent to set, in my judgment.

These reasons satisfy me that I ought to vote against the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion made by the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] to strike out the first section of the bill, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MCCREERY, (when the name of Mr. STEVENSON was called.) My colleague is unwell, and is detained from the Senate for that reason. He asked me to make this statement on the call of the roll.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 24, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Caperton, Clayton, Cockrell, Cooper, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Key, Logan, McCreery, Maxey, Mitchell, Paddock, Sargent, Sherman, Wadleigh, and Withers—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Davis, Dawes, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Jones of Florida, Kernan, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Oglesby, Randolph, Ransom, Saulsbury, Thurman, Wallace, Windom, and Wright—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bayard, Bruce, Conover, Cragin, Eaton, English, Gordon, Hamilton, Harvey, Johnston, Morton, Patterson, Robertson, Sharon, Spencer, Stevenson, West, and Whyte—20.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THURMAN. I move to strike out the whole of line 9 of section 1, which is "said indemnity fund, including all accumulations of interest," and insert in lieu "the sum paid by said government without interest." So that if the amendment prevails the section will authorize the President—

To pay over to the government of Japan the residue of the sum paid by said government without interest.

We do not pay interest on claims against the United States to our own citizens. There are very few governments that pay interest. So far as interest has accumulated in this case, it is simply because in some way that I do not understand this money, instead of being covered into the Treasury, has been kept under the control of the Department of State and invested in bonds of the United States. We have not received interest on this money. We have simply invested it in our own bonds, and an accumulation of interest upon those bonds is simply a computation of interest against the Government of the United States. I see no reason, therefore, why we should pay interest, and I think it will be doing all that the national honor and that a good example will require if, after making the deductions that I propose we shall make, we pay over the remainder of the principal without interest.

One word upon another point suggested by a remark of my friend from Missouri, [Mr. BOGY,] if I heard his remark correctly, and that is that if we are to pay over this money we have no right to retain the $125,000 provided in the bill to be paid to the officers and crew of the Wyoming and the Takiang. I cannot agree with that idea. That was fairly and properly a part of the amount that ought to be paid to this Government. We were fairly entitled not only to be reimbursed the actual injury sustained by the Pembroke, the actual injury sustained by the Wyoming, but also to retain what according to the usage of this Government has been the allowance to the officers and crews of vessels in the Navy who have done services meriting national recognition. I do not think therefore that there can be the slightest objection to retaining the second section in this bill, and at the same time returning to Japan anything that we think in justice and consistent with the honor of the country we ought to return. But I do not think we ought to compute interest upon a fund on which we never have received interest, and make a distinction in favor of a foreign government when we are doing an act of generosity, so to speak, unparalleled in the history of the world by paying them back not only the principal but also interest upon it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the last instance in which one government has paid any money to another that I know of, was the matter between Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain and the United States, and in that instance interest was paid so far as we can gather, certainly it entered, according to all our information, largely, to the extent of nearly 30 per cent. or perhaps quite 30 per cent., into the gross sum that was allowed. Now the Senator says that in this case we have not received any interest from this money. It is true we have not loaned it out to people and gathered interest in that way; but this money, the actual cash, was invested in United States bonds by the State Department, according to a traditionary policy, that whatever is payable to the United States from foreign governments is not to be put into the Treasury, although the statutes say it shall be, as I understand them, but is kept apart. This money was invested in United States bonds that bear interest and the money paid for the bonds went into the Treasury of the United States when it was paid over and was applied to the common uses of the Government. We have had the use of the money. It has not been lying idle in our hands in specie, in the vaults of the Treasury or the vaults of the State Department, a thing unused and nothing got out of it; but the actual advantage of the use of this money we have had just as much as if we had borrowed it of the government of Japan and applied it to the payment of the expenses of the war and the other expenses of the Government. As a mere matter of form it was put in the State Department in the shape of Government bonds; but the money was actually expended for the uses of the United States, and in the place of the money there stand in the State Department those obligations of the United States that we call bonds. We hold our own bonds for it. That is the short of it. So we have had the use of the money. If, as was true in the case at Geneva, after five or six years of delay that element ought to be taken into consideration, if this claim is just at all the element of interest ought to be taken into consideration because we have actually profited by money that we should otherwise have been obliged to borrow from somebody else to exactly the extent of the value of the money used by the Government.

Then, if we are to do this thing, do not let us begin to figure and to pair on this question of honor and duty, but let us give to this people from whom we have wrongfully extorted three-quarters of a million of dollars the benefit we have received from the use of this money according to its price in the market, being its interest.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I have for a great many years thought it was the duty of the Government of the United States to return this money to Japan. I think that people were forced in their distress to pay the money, forced by two great powers besides our own, France and England, and also by the Netherlands. They were compelled to pay the money or suffer great injury to themselves. The question has been so ably and fully discussed that I do not want to say anything on the subject; but, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I have always believed that we ought to return the money. I have opposed all the projects, and there have been a good many, to get the money out of the Government and use it to establish schools and colleges and missionary societies and so on. I have opposed all such propositions because I think the honor of the Government requires that we should return the money to the authorities of Japan.

Now, I think the proposition of the Senator from Ohio is a just one. That we should have given the money back long ago, I have no doubt. It would have been returned before but for our own impoverished condition. We have not been able to do it heretofore. If we give them the money which we took from them, saving from that the amount which the naval officers and sailors believe they have earned under the laws of the country, I think we shall act justly. I would give them back the whole of this sum without interest, though that exception never occurred to me until the motion was made by the Senator from Ohio. I think his proposition is a wise one; I think it is just to both countries; and therefore I shall vote for it.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio is to strike out of the bill the accumulations of interest, and to retain those in our own hands. If I have understood the argument of the Senator from Ohio in support of the bill, it is that we are, in respect to this fund, a trustee in our own wrong. That certainly is the ground upon which I support it; and I think I heard him repeat a great many times in support of the bill that we had no business with the money at all; that it was not our money in equity; that this is a proceeding in a court of equity by which a trustee is made to disgorge the money that he holds in trust; and it is proposed by the Senator from Ohio now to retain what we have made out of it, to retain the interest, and everything that the trustee has made. The trustee holding in his own wrong and without right proposes to retain all he has been able to make out of a fund that he had never any business with! I do not know of any court of equity in the world that ever laid down such a doctrine as that; and if I am to confess by my vote, as I propose to do in support of this bill, that this fund does not belong to us, I am not going to stultify myself by saying at the same time that I propose to retain all we have made out of it.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I do not know that in all this discussion I have ever used the word "trustee." I do not know that I have ever said that the United States holds this fund as a trustee. I have said that if the Senate were satisfied that we had received from Japan much more than paid all our losses, all that we could fairly have claimed of that government, it would be a sublime spectacle, and of good example, and the first set in the history of the world, so far as I know, to return the surplus to that government. I have admitted that it is questionable, certainly very questionable, in view of the considerations urged by the Senator from Vermont yesterday with so much force, whether we are under any moral obligation to set this good example. But, if the Senate is satisfied that we have received from that power money which we ought not to have demanded from it, then I do say again that I can conceive of nothing more calculated to elevate the character of the country, and—if I saw fit to go into it—to promote its material interests, too, in its intercourse with foreign powers, than to return this money.

So much for that. Now, a word in respect to the particular motion that I have made to amend, and which strikes out the accumulation of interest. In the first place, I fail to see the analogy between this case and the Geneva award, to which the Senator from Vermont has referred. Great Britain was properly chargeable with interest and compelled to pay interest by the award at Geneva. The claims upon her were the claims of private men. The national claims were rejected. The claims allowed were the claims of private men whose property had been destroyed through her culpable negligence, as that arbitration determined; and it was therefore perfectly right that, for the satisfaction of these private claims, she should pay not only the principal loss, but interest also. I fail to see any analogy between that case and the question whether we shall pay interest to Japan if we, without any legal obligation upon us, but simply out of a sense of justice, out of a high principle of honor, see fit to return to her a portion of the sum that she has paid to us. I repeat that I see no reason for doing better by her than we do by our own people. We do not pay interest upon claims against the Government. A private citizen may have the most just claim in the world upon the Government of the United States; he may pursue it for long years, as so many have, before the Congress of the United States; he may be at great expense in prosecuting his claim here; and if, perchance, at the end of ten, or fifteen, or twenty, or fifty years the claim is allowed, we simply pay the principal without interest. That is a general rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the principle upon which it rests?

Mr. THURMAN. Well, sir, I am hardly able to say what is the principle on which it rests. It would be pretty difficult to find any very commendable principle upon which it does rest except the principle of the danger that any government would incur if it paid interest upon the claims against it. It is very certain that if the Government were to allow interest upon claims against it it would be to the interest of claimants to defer the presentation of their claims, perchance, because no investment could be so good as a Government liability with interest upon it, and, for that or for some other reason it has been the universal practice of this Government, and, I believe, of every government, not to pay interest upon claims. I see no reason why, if in this case we see fit to return this money, we should do more for a country that has no legal claim upon us for the money than we do for our own citizens who have legal claims upon us for the amounts that are due them; and therefore I think that this computation of interest—for that is all it comes to—ought not to be made against the Government of the United States.

It is said by the Senator from Vermont that we have had the use of the money; that the money was paid for Government bonds, and then that money went into the Treasury. That is all very true, no doubt; but whether or not we have made any interest upon that money, or whether there has been a balance always in the Treasury far exceeding this amount, is a question that every Senator can answer according to the best of his information. I think it will be found that there never has been a day since this money was paid that there was not in the Treasury of the United States more money than we received from Japan.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But may I ask the Senator whether we did not get it into the Treasury by very large loans of hundreds of millions since that money was received by the United States?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir, we have borrowed money undoubtedly, and we have paid a great deal of interest, and we have sold our bonds at a ruinous sacrifice. That is all very true; but still does not touch the general principle that governments do not pay interest upon claims against them.

I think that the friends of this bill had better consent to this amendment. It most materially reduces the sum. We are told that the amount of this so-called Japanese indemnity fund is now $1,200,000. Deduct from that $125,000, and you have $1,075,000. That in the present condition of the Treasury is a very considerable sum; and it does seem to me that in view of this fact the bill is likely to encounter more hostility here and elsewhere, if I may be permitted to use that language, if it is retained in its present shape, than it would if we put this upon precisely the same footing upon which we place all the people of the United States who have claims upon the Government.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I was inclined at first to vote for this bill; but I have heard reasoning in reference to it on both sides of so striking a character that it has caused me to commence thinking as to the principle involved in this question.

The Senator from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, says that this bill ought to pass, and gives as one reason that part of the money ought to be paid because we owe it to the Japanese government; that we were not entitled to it, and therefore we ought to return it. In the next breath, he says we ought to take a part of it and give it to those men who acted so gallantly. The same remark was made by the Senator from Ohio, or substantially the same. That remark made by these two Senators struck me with great force. First, we should return the money, because we were not entitled to it; and, in the second place, not being entitled to it, we should take part of it and give it to somebody else who was not entitled to it! There is the whole argument.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope my friend will understand me correctly. I am sure I never said, and I have not heard a Senator here say, that we were entitled to no part of this money. I have not heard a Senator here say that we were not entitled to what was necessary to make us whole for the losses that we actually sustained.

Mr. LOGAN. That has all been paid.

Mr. THURMAN. It has all been paid; but the Senator if he will look at this bill will see——

Mr. LOGAN. I have looked at the bill and I think I understand it and I think I understand the Senator. His argument yesterday, and to-day, too, was first that we should return the money because we were not entitled to it. If we are entitled to it, of course we ought not to return it, but we ought to return it because we are not entitled to it. Second, we will take part of it and give it to somebody else who is not entitled to it. That is the bill on its face and that is the argument made by Senators.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not wish the Senator to misunderstand me; but he certainly has misrepresented me very much, unintentionally no doubt. I say that we are under no obligation, and I know of no one who says that we are under any obligation, to return any of this money which we ought to retain for our indemnity; and I do say that the money provided for in the second section of this bill is as much a just claim as the money that we retained for the injury to the Pembroke or the Wyoming.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I desire to say only a word. I do not think we are entitled to this money, because our agents did that which was unjust. They made war upon this people when they were in a defenseless and unprotected condition, when they were not able to defend themselves. We, like strong men dealing with weak men, made conditions which that people had to accept or to be almost exterminated. We have laws in this country which give to the Navy of the United States prize-money, which system I think is unjust. There is no more reason why a sailor should get prize-money, or a portion of that property which he takes possession of, than there is that a soldier should have it. The soldier gets only his pay. The naval officer gets a portion of the property which is taken from the enemy. That, I think, is wrong in principle; but it is the law, and therefore it is supposed to be right. Hence I say in giving this money back to the Japanese government we should retain that portion of it which is needed to compensate our sailors for what they are entitled to under the law.

The whole of it in the beginning was wrong; was an act of injustice; was an act of powerful combination against a weak and individual government. The subject has been before the Committee on Foreign Relations for years and I have always, as I said before, opposed every attempt to interfere with the integrity of this sum of money. Now, to get clear of it I would give it back. A strong government has no more right to keep the money which it obtains by its force from a weak nation than an individual has a right to take money from a weaker individual. We are governed here by principles of justice.

I am very sorry to interrupt my friend from Illinois——

Mr. LOGAN. Go on.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. It seems to me that we, this great power, should not do as the Senator from Ohio a little while ago said, pretend to be magnanimous and generous. I say we are only acting justly; we are not pretending anything. No government can be injured when it acts justly to a nation or an individual, strong or weak. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio is a very wise one. He says give back this money without interest, because it has really been of no use to us. It was invested in our own bonds and those bonds accumulated to a large amount. If we give them back the whole sum which is not necessary to pay what we are compelled to pay by law to the Navy and to other persons who had claims, I think they ought to be satisfied.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from Pennsylvania has, I believe, pretty clearly demonstrated the correctness of my proposition, but when I rose I did not intend to discuss this general question. The argument struck me, as I stated, so strangely that I was almost compelled to ask a question or put the proposition as it had been put by other Senators. The Senator from Pennsylvania is opposed to prize-money, but he would give these men what they are entitled to under the law. The Senator from Ohio said, not under the law, but what they were entitled to. I maintain that they are not entitled to one cent under any law that stands to-day on our statute-books or ever did.

What does prize-money mean? Will any man tell me that there is a law in the United States to-day that gives an officer of a vessel prize-money where he neither takes a prize nor destroys property that could become a prize by capture? Will any Senator say that that is the law? I should like to hear one say so, if he believes it. There is no such law, and there is no law upon our statute-books to-day that would give these men one dollar.

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly the Senator from Illinois must know that, if there were a law on the statute-book that gave this prize-money, this bill would not be here.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course.

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly the Senator must know that there was no law on the statute-book that gave the officers and crew of the Kearsarge prize-money. Certainly he must know that there was no law on the statute-book that gave Commodore Decatur prize-money for the Algerine vessels. And so on of the dozen other cases that I could mention. But the question has always been whether the service was not so meritorious as to deserve recognition and whether the bare fact that the vessel was sunk instead of being captured and brought into port and condemned in a prize-court ought to make any difference with an American Congress. That is the question.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I was speaking of the assertion of the Senator from Pennsylvania that these men were entitled under the law, and the Senator from Ohio intimated himself that they were entitled. I say they are not entitled under the law nor under precedent. Will any Senator tell me that a man fighting shore batteries with a vessel is fighting against any property that can be captured or the destruction of which entitles a party to prize-money? In neither case could they be entitled to prize-money; and the fact that we owned the vessel ourselves does not give prize-money or entitle any one to it. But if the argument of the Senator from Ohio is correct that we are not entitled to this money and never have been, except merely to retain the amount of damage done to our property, I ask why should our officers be paid for perpetrating a wrong on the part of this Government? There is no principle that authorizes prize-money in a case of that kind. If they perpetrated a wrong, and for that reason we are to return this money, there is no principle that will give them the money demanded in this bill.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him again?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. Who has said that these officers perpetrated a wrong?

Mr. LOGAN. I did not say that any one said so.

Mr. THURMAN. I think not.

Mr. LOGAN. I am speaking of the principle. If it was wrong for us to receive the money as an indemnity, then the act was a wrong act. That is the reasoning I am meeting.

Mr. THURMAN. That is not the idea at all. The idea is that we received a great deal more than was necessary to indemnify us.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; I will put it on that ground. We received more than was necessary to indemnify us, and having been indemnified, the surplus or the overplus above that which we were entitled to we propose to gobble part of and give away. That is all. It is dishonest. You may put it on that ground and you cannot maintain your proposition. You cannot upon any ground that you place it—it does not make any difference which—call this an honest bill. If you want to pay these people prize-money, pay it out of the Treasury of the United States; do not state before the gazing world that we have robbed the Japanese government and ought to pay them back $500,000 or $600,000, but that in paying it back we must take a slice out of it to keep from paying what we ought to pay ourselves as prize-money if it is just. We ought not to do that. Is that correct? I ask the honorable Senator from Ohio if that is honest, if that is correct? I say it is neither honest nor just nor correct in any sense whatever.

Mr. MERRIMON. Will the Senator allow me to make one remark?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MERRIMON. I think the terms of the treaty are broad enough to include any bounty that might be bestowed on the officers and seamen; and, besides, the Senator will see if he will look back to the correspondence between the ministers of the combined powers and the representatives of the Japanese government that this very subject of prize-money was mentioned in that correspondence.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Can the Senator refer to that?

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from North Carolina uses the word "bounty." There is a very great difference between bounty and the law of bounty and the law of prize.

Mr. MERRIMON. But I do not go on the ground that they are entitled to it by virtue of the law of prize. I go on the ground that it was expressly provided for by the treaty.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon; it is not provided for in the treaty at all or anything in reference to bounty or prize-money.

Mr. MERRIMON. That depends on the construction you put on the language of the treaty, and, as I stated a moment ago, the correspondence shows that the subject of prize-money, and I believe of bounty also, was mentioned, was made a part of the basis of the treaty.

Mr. LOGAN. I should be glad if the Senator would read any single line in that treaty that provides anything in reference to prize-money or bounty-money either.

Mr. MERRIMON. I will read this clause with the Senator's permission.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator give the page and book?

Mr. MERRIMON. Second volume of the Revised Statutes, page 459, the first article, in these words:

The amount payable to the four powers is fixed at $3,000,000. This sum to include all claims, of whatever nature, for past aggressions on the part of Nagato, whether indemnities, ransom for Simonoseki, or expenses entailed by the operations of the allied squadrons.

Mr. LOGAN. This was to include all claims whatever. What claims? Claims of our Government against the Japanese government. Does the Senator pretend that bounty to a ship or prize-money to one of our own vessels is a claim on a foreign government?

Mr. MERRIMON. "Claim" certainly covered it.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg pardon; it is not either in principle or law a claim upon a foreign government; it is a claim of these men upon our Treasury under the law, if they are entitled to bounty or prize money, but no claim of our Government on another.

Mr. MERRIMON. But without reference to the strict law, I say it was perfectly competent for them to treat on that subject.

Mr. LOGAN. But they did not treat on that subject, for it was not mentioned.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly I will give way. I only rose to call attention to this inconsistency. I do not wish to make any argument.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not wish to stop the Senator's speech, in which I am interested, but I want to move an adjournment. I submit that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and twelve minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 3, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EASTERN BAND OF CHEROKEE INDIANS.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 1987 a bill (H. R. No. 3358) to authorize and enable the eastern band of the Cherokee Indians to institute and prosecute a suit or suits in the Court of Claims; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

EXPENSES OF DELEGATES OF CHEROKEE INDIANS.

Mr. SEELYE, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs a bill (H. R. No. 3360) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to pay the expenses of delegates from the eastern band of Cherokee Indians; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SEELYE. I ask that this bill be put on its passage now.

There was no objection.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to pay out of any moneys in his possession or in his control belonging to the eastern band of Cherokee Indians, (being those of the Cherokee Indians residing east of the Mississippi River,) to Lloyd R. Welch, principal chief of said Indians, and C. H. Tayler, as agents and delegates from said Indians to attend to their interests in Washington, their actual and necessary expenses and such per diem as in his judgment is right and proper for their services. But such expenses and per diem are not to extend beyond the expiration of the present session of Congress.

Mr. SEELYE. This bill is reported by the unanimous direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] can state in a moment the object and necessity of the measure.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. The eastern band of Cherokee Indians in North Carolina, at their annual grand council, appointed a delegation to come to Washington to attend to important business. Those delegates have not been paid. This Eastern band has a fund which is held in trust by the Secretary of the Interior, and this bill simply proposes that the expenses of the delegation and a per diem, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, shall be paid out of that fund. There can be no objection to the measure.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SEELYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EASTERN BAND NORTH CAROLINA CHEROKEES.

Mr. SEELYE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3361) to authorize the eastern band of North Carolina Cherokees to institute suits, to provide for the purchase of lands, to have a final settlement, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EDUCATION.

Mr. WALKER, of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 748) to apply the proceeds of sales of public lands to the education of the people be made a special order for the 18th of this month, to continue from day to day until disposed of.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

SETTLEMENT WITH RAILWAY COMPANIES.

Mr. HARTRIDGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3362) to provide for the settlement with certain railway companies; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

Mr. BANNING. The bill (H. R. No. 2935) to promote the efficiency of the Army was made a special order for to-day. As there is other business coming up to-day with which I do not wish to interfere, I ask that this bill be made a special order for Tuesday next at twelve o'clock, in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, and from day to day until disposed of.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

EXPENDITURES IN THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask that the evidence heretofore taken and to be taken by the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department be ordered to be printed for the use of the committee.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

PENSIONS.

Mr. JENKS. I ask that the bill (H. R. No. 2283) granting a pension to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican and Florida wars be made a special order for the 19th of May, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. HURLBUT. Subject to appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Of course.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

GOLD AND SILVER.

Mr. BLAND, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining, as a substitute for House bill No. 2715, a bill (H. R. No. 3363) to utilize the product of gold and silver mines, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, recommitted, and ordered to be printed.

INDEMNITY SCHOOL SELECTIONS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. WIGGINTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3364) relating to indemnity school selections in the State of California; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES OFFICERS AT NEW ORLEANS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. HOSKINS in place of Mr. FOSTER, excused from service on the committee to investigate the conduct of United States officers at New Orleans.

BUILDING FIFTEENTH AND PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting an estimate from the Quartermaster-General for a special appropriation for rent of building at the corner of Fifteenth street and Pennsylvania avenue; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF EDWARD PAINTER, DECEASED.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting estimate of appropriations for the relief of the heirs of Edward Painter, deceased; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LE MOYNE VS. FARWELL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first business in order this morning is the consideration of the report from the Committee of Elections in the case of J. V. Le Moyne vs. C. B. Farwell, from the third congressional district of Illinois, on which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLACKBURN. At the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SEELYE,] I yield him three minutes of my time.

Mr. SEELYE. Mr. Speaker, having no previous knowledge of this question, I have listened attentively to the discussion in order that I might faithfully discharge the responsible duty of voting upon it; and I thank the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] of the Committee of Elections for yielding to me two or three minutes of his closing time in order that I may state the way in which my judgment has been led, which I am glad to have the opportunity of doing before his closing remarks, in order that if I am mistaken he may out of his abundant knowledge correct me.

I take it this whole issue hinges on the question whether the votes of the pauper inmates of the almshouse at the Norwood Park precinct should be received or rejected. If those votes are received, the contestant gains his case; if they are rejected, the present occupant retains his seat.

It is admitted that those votes were duly challenged, and that the right to cast them rests entirely upon the residence of the voters in the precinct. Now, I remember when I was a school-boy that the definition of residence then taught, the definition which had been taught for generations before, and which, so far as I can learn, has not been improved upon since, was the place where a man—larem rerumque ac fortunarum suarum summam constituit—has set or established his hearth and the chief of his fortunes and goods. It belongs thus only to a person, and depends thus wholly upon the exercise of a personal choice and will. A tree, a horse, a thing of any sort, cannot then have a residence, and a man incarcerated against his will, or confined within certain precincts without his choice, cannot be said to reside where he is thus obliged to remain. If this be true, and if it be true as I have learned from this discussion and has not been disputed that the supreme court of Illinois has decided that a pauper cannot gain a residence by living in an almshouse, then it follows that these paupers neither have nor could have a residence at Norwood Park, and neither were nor could be voters in the precinct where they were found. I am therefore obliged to vote with the minority of this committee and with what I should expect to be the majority of this House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, appreciating as I do the patience with which this House has listened to the lengthy if not tedious discussion of this case, I would be indisposed to trench upon its time, if I could believe that justice to the issue involved, justice to the Committee of Elections of which I am a member, justice to that subcommittee who were intrusted with this case and who prepared the report that this House is asked to adopt, justice to this House itself and to the country, would warrant me in holding my peace. I would much have preferred the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS,] the chairman of this committee, might himself have been present to have closed this discussion; but he is absent by reason of sickness in his family, and hence the duty devolves on me, his colleague on that subcommittee, as it is evidently the desire of the House no longer to delay final action in the case.

I cannot believe it would be right to allow this question to come to a vote after the House has been sitting here listening to four uninterrupted speeches, following each other consecutively upon the republican side, and I might also feel warranted in venturing the remark that some at least of these gentlemen appeared desirous of so mystifying and confusing the facts involved as intentionally to mislead this House from the true issues upon which it is called to pass.

The decision of a contested-election case, sir, is not only one of the highest privilege known to a deliberative body, but it is in its very nature essentially a judicial act. It is certainly one in which appeals to partisan prejudice are scarcely admissible, and I can but regret that they should have been introduced into this discussion. We have been told, sir, by gentlemen on the other side that it was useless for them to enter a protest, that it was useless for them to plead facts, because they took it for granted that a dominant majority would refuse to listen to the dictates of equity, and in the exercise of an arbitrary power without regard to rights they would unseat one gentleman and seat another.

Not only have we heard this from members of this House who have been engaged in the discussion, but it seems that the honorable gentleman from Illinois, whose seat is now under contest, has himself been involved in these wholesale charges of partisan prejudice, seeking to derogate from the fairness, the magnanimity, and the honesty of the jury before whom he is now on trial. I read, sir, what purport to be extracts from a letter written by the honorable gentleman from the third district of Illinois since the Committee of Elections made their report to this House, and which have been published broadcast in the newspapers of the land, in order that this House may see the estimate that he puts upon the sense of fairness that is to actuate the tribunal before whom he is now on trial:

Hon. Charles B. Farwell, of Chicago, writes as follows to a friend in McLean County, under date of April 10:

"To be unseated by ex-rebels causes me to have no regrets. The democratic platform now is, 'The country must be governed by the representatives of the lost cause.' In other words, whoever assisted to preserve the Republic must be put down. The House to-day is under the absolute control of pardoned, unrepentant rebels. The animosities of sectional strife are as bitter to-day as they were in 1860, and the question for us to determine is, Shall the South or the North govern? This is the platform and question. There is no other possible issue, and he who votes the democratic ticket is in favor of elevating to power unreconstructed, unrepentant, and unforgiving rebels.

That extract, sir, I find copied from one of the Illinois papers into the Chicago Tribune; and the sentiment that it expresses has been echoed by more than one gentleman upon one side of this Chamber. I will not venture, Mr. Speaker, to give utterance to the estimation in which men who make these charges are held by the victims of their aspersions and the objects of their calumnies. The utterers themselves may be worthy of notice, but the proprieties of this occasion preclude such an effort on my part. I choose rather to have them judged and to have them condemned out of the mouth of one of their own trusted leaders. I choose rather to read from an authority which that side of the House must not question. It comes from an ex-member of this House, the late minister of this Government to the Court of St. James, if he is not the present one. It comes from General Schenck, universally conceded by the political organization to which he belongs to be an oracle upon politics, if not upon other sciences possessing the same initial letter. I find in a certain contested-election case here in this House that General Schenck held the following language, which is applicable to this point:

I have more respect for an open rebel who seeks by violence to overthrow the Government he has sworn to defend than I have for one of these election cheats. The man who seeks by fraud, by mean, contemptible perjury, to impose himself upon the people of this country as a legal voter, to take part in the selection of their Representatives and officers, is worse than an avowed rebel. The one carries on his war openly and bravely, the other undertakes to sap and undermine the Government. The one would commit murder by force, the other by poison. And more than that, sir—more than that, sir, the man that procures himself or others to be elected to office by such fraudulent or spurious votes is worse and more guilty than the foreigner on whose ignorance perhaps he imposes.

And to this I call the attention of those gentlemen—

If, before I finish the discussion of this case, I do not make that utterance of General Schenck apply to the gentleman from Illinois, then it will be because the facts that are here printed in the record have escaped my memory.

We were told by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] in the closing portion of his speech that in not one single case had this committee or this House failed to turn the issue to the advantage of their partisans. His words were:

Every doubt is resolved by our democratic friends in favor of their party every time, without missing a single count.

These are grave charges, sir, to bring against men who are selected by the presiding officer of this House and charged under their oaths with the performance of judicial functions. They do absolutely and actually embrace the charge of perjury; and I trust this House will pardon me for a moment while I seek to compare the record and see how it shall stand. I believe that but five cases have yet been acted upon by the Committee of Elections and reported to this House. It is known that in two of those cases republican contestants have been seated. The colored member from the first district of Alabama [Mr. HARALSON] holds his seat to-day in this House by the unanimous action of this committee and the unanimous action of the House. The honorable gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STRAIT] has already been brought to this House bearing in his hand the unanimous indorsement of the Committee of Elections. The democratic contestants in both cases have been turned from your doors without a single dissenting voice.

If it were not that the rule of this House prohibits it, I might say that in that committee-room, as in this House, unanimous action has never been had upon any question of a contested election unless it was when it inured to the benefit of the republican and the disadvantage of the democrat. But I do not intend to enter upon any vindication of this committee or the House. I am willing to let the facts speak for themselves. I am content to remind this House that from the day of the organization of your Government up to the advent of the republican party to power there never were but sixty-five contested-election cases brought before American Congresses; that from the day of the advent of the republican party into power until now there have been in that short space of fifteen years nearly two hundred contested-election cases brought here for determination. I leave it to any gentleman upon that side of the House who is bold enough to tell the country the dwarfed and shriveled percentage of the cases in which you have dared to decide against your partisans. Contested-election cases, like the public debt, public plundering, public corruption, and many other things reprehensible and deplorable, seem to thrive under the favorable auspices of republican rule.

I am contented to state facts which stand recorded in history, that that party is responsible for having disfranchised whole States and sections, for having robbed millions of the right of suffrage. In the Fortieth Congress we saw the doors of this House closed in the faces of the entire delegation from my State, who came here bearing their certificates of election, and in a great majority of cases their seats were uncontested by anybody, while a peripatetic committee was appointed and traveled over the country to see if they could raise up any semblance of excuse on which to predicate their action. We saw that the republican majority in that Congress, in the face of 1,500 unquestioned majority, seated McKee in his contest against Mr. Young, and that, too, when the trusted leaders of that party protested against it by voice and by vote; when such men as Bingham, of Ohio, and Poland, of Vermont, himself a republican member of the Committee of Elections, and their own great matchless leader, Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, denounced it as a fraud and went to record against the perpetration of the iniquity.

We saw that same republican majority decide a contested election in the Forty-first Congress from the State of South Carolina, when in order to seat a republican member against a democratic contestant they had to reject absolutely the whole vote of six out of the nine counties composing the congressional district, and that was done and the member so seated to-day holds a seat upon the floor of this House. We saw that same party majority in the last Congress refusing admittance to the representatives of the State of Louisiana whom they were finally forced to acknowledge as legally entitled to their seats, and we saw them in the expiring hours of that Congress, upon the very day of its adjournment, upon the last day of its last session, admit to his seat upon the floor a member from that State whom they admitted that they had cheated and defrauded of his rights and robbed his constituency of the right of representation.

Time fails to recount the instances in which their partisan zeal has been manifested to this disgust of the whole land. Is it meet, is it proper, that we with a record of two contested cases out of five decided in favor of those opposed to us should be read lectures on party fairness by such authorities? Let the drunkard in his maudlin soliloquy descant upon the beauties of a temperate life, or the prince of darkness prate on the merits of a scheme of universal redemption, but for the sake of consistency, in Heaven's name, shelter us from such homilies falling from the lips of men who never yet have been able to raise themselves above the dead level of the partisan, and before whose tribunal the pleadings of justice have ever been drowned amid the wild clamor of party.

I do not desire to appeal to the party prejudices of any man in this House. I desire to state the facts, and when I get through with them they will have been stated. I undertake now to say that there is not a member on this floor conversant with the proof as disclosed in this record who will venture to dissent from my representation of the facts when I shall have finished, however much he may differ from the conclusions at which I have arrived.

There are but three questions involved in this case. Upon all others the committee are substantially agreed. It is not denied that in the second precinct of the twentieth ward—at least it has not been denied in the argument before the House—that 10 illegal votes are proved against Mr. Farwell which must be deducted. It is not denied that in the fifth precinct 3 illegal votes cast for Mr. Farwell have to be deducted. It is not denied that in the fourth precinct of the eighteenth ward 13 illegal votes cast for Mr. Farwell have to be deducted. It is not denied that; because of defective affidavits, in the third precinct of the eighteenth ward 3 votes cast for Mr. Farwell have to be deducted. That leaves but three questions for consideration: First, the vote in the third precinct of the eighteenth ward; second, whether there shall be counted or rejected the pauper vote, as it is denominated, or the vote of citizens of Cook County at Norwood Park precinct; and the third, and the most important to my mind, the clearest, is as to the right and duty of this House to purge the poll in the first precinct of the twentieth ward.

Now, what are the facts in reference to the third precinct of the eighteenth ward? The record shows that the election law of the State was utterly disregarded; that the ballots were not counted by the officers of the election; that they were not sealed; that they were not kept in the custody of one of those in whose charge they are placed by the direction of the statute; but that the ballot-box, unsealed and unguarded, was left all night in a bar-room in the custody of nobody. That there was a partial count had that night, it does appear. It does appear in evidence by the testimony of one man that he learned from somebody that such and such was the vote given in that precinct for member of Congress. He does not say from whom he got it.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I hope the gentleman will not misrepresent the facts.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am not misrepresenting the facts, and if the gentleman will sit still he will see it. It does appear in evidence by the testimony of one man that after the poll closed in the third precinct of the eighteenth ward that night there was a partial count of the ballots cast, but that no official return was made. He managed to ascertain from somebody what was said to be the vote cast.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. The return was made by the judges of election.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will state the facts, and I am ready to go to the record upon my responsibility. There was no return made by the judges at all.

He says that he did learn that night what was the vote and he did report it to the police headquarters. He says that the next day when the official return was made, according to his recollection there was no difference in the vote for Congressman between the information he got the night before and the official return as made the next day.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I trust the gentleman will be as brief as he can. I sat here for an hour and a quarter and listened to him without attempting to interrupt him.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I wish simply to make this statement: The evidence shows that the judges made out the returns the night of the election.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am not better informed now than before the gentleman interrupted me, and I trust he will not interrupt me again.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I allowed each man to have his time without interrupting him, and now my time is come, and I trust I will be allowed to state without interruption what the record proves. The record does not prove that any official return was made out that night; the record, on the contrary, expressly proves that that statement is not true. If they made out their official returns that night, why did they come back the next day, count the votes over again, and make out a second return? There never was but one return made, and that was not made by the officers of election. The count had upon the succeeding day, and upon which the officers predicated their return, and which they evidently regarded as the official count, is expressly proved by the testimony to have been made, not by the officers of election, but by two of those officers and a horde of humanity that had gathered around the doors of this drinking-saloon in which this box had been left unsealed for fourteen hours.

There is the record; they did make a partial count that night; somebody did tell this witness what the vote was, and this witness says that he reported it to the police headquarters. But the next day two of the officers of election went back, gathered up some outside friends, went into this drinking-saloon, found this unsealed and unguarded ballot-box, took it into a back room, there counted the ballots, and made their official return upon that count. The question is whether this House will, in the consideration of this case, take cognizance of that poll. In that precinct Farwell had a majority of 14 votes. If precedents are to be followed, if law is to be regarded, if evidences of fraud are to be regarded, if the most violent of all presumptions are to be had, this House cannot and dare not count the 14 majority awarded to Mr. Farwell in that third precinct of the eighteenth ward.

Upon this point I have a distinguished authority before me; it is none other than that of the justly distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] who, when a member of the Committee of Elections and making a report, held the following language, in regard to this question as to whether it is absolutely necessary to prove that fraud had been actually committed. This is what he says:

> It makes no difference, for the purpose of my point, whether it was there twelve hours or twelve days. Now, I do not claim that there is any evidence here that when that bar-room was left alone—

Mark the similarity of the two cases in this respect. There was a bar-room figuring as the depository in both cases—

> I do not claim that there is any evidence here that when that bar-room was left alone in the day-time, or when it was left alone in the night, any person entered it, opened that box, and substituted other numbered ballots for the ballots which it contained. All I say is that adroitness less than that practiced for a less important purpose in many and ordinary cases of crime, robbery, burglary, and forgery, could easily accomplish that result. Now, we know how eager, how unscrupulous, how adroit in many instances are the means which are used to affect political contests. It is not a question whether it is proved that the friends of this very respectable and very able gentleman who claims this seat did or were capable of doing such a thing. The question is whether you are willing to turn out a sitting member from this House whenever hereafter in any district of the country any member may be able to do such a thing, and may have been able to do it without detection.

And further on he says:

> It is not merely a question whether the recount was correct; it is a question whether you know and are sure that the same thing was counted, or which should have been counted, at the time the original count was made.

The testimony shows conclusively that while this witness remembered that the vote as announced the night before for congressman was the same as the vote officially returned the next day, still there was a difference in the report of the night before and the official return of the next day in reference to other officers voted for on that occasion; proof conclusive that this ballot-box was tampered with, and only negative proof as to whether this contestant was made to suffer by reason of that fraud.

In the case of Taylor vs. Reading, page 661, the proof showed opportunity for tampering with the ballot-box, but it did not show the fact. In that case the Committee of Elections report:

> Your committee can come to no other conclusion than that the claim of contestant to a credit of these 54 votes is already vindicated.

The presumption of fraud was there alleged, and the presumption of the purpose of fraud is here alleged.

I am content to rest that third precinct of the eighteenth ward just where we have it. In order to enable the sitting member to retain his seat in this House, I want members to bear in mind that it is necessary they should refuse to reject the poll of this third precinct of the eighteenth ward; it is further necessary that they should reject the vote of every man who voted from the Norwood Park farm; and then they will not seat him unless they go further, and say that the first precinct of the twentieth ward shall not be purged of its fraud, but the prayer of the sitting member shall be granted to reject the entire poll. They must do all three of these things before they can refuse to the contestant a seat upon this floor. It matters not, so far as the practical result is concerned, what view you may take of any one of these three points, or any two of them; you must accept the views of the other side of the House upon all three, or else you unseat the sitting member and seat the contestant.

As to the second point involved, which has been more fully discussed than any other issue, I will say but a few words. It is contended that certain citizens of Norwood Park township were not entitled to vote because they were paupers. There is no proof in this record that they were paupers; the allegation is not established by any evidence. He who asserts the illegality of a vote must prove it. The law in its mercy presumes that a man is innocent of a fraud or a crime until the contrary is established. The record shows that each one of these men, as required by the statute law of Illinois, swore in his vote; the record shows that each one of these men went further, and, after making the necessary affidavit that he was a legal voter in that precinct, proved it by a householder of the precinct. In the absence of contradicting testimony, in the utter absence of any proof or attempt to prove that these men were disqualified, are you prepared to say that they have sworn falsely, that the presumption of law should be against the voter instead of in his favor; that these householders by whom their affidavits are confirmed have committed perjury? Are you prepared to do this in view of the uncontradicted testimony which shows that these citizens of Norwood Park went forward through their agent and applied for the opportunity to register, and were swindled out of it by that man who is a witness on the other side, Corse, the town clerk, and his coadjutor in part, Stockwell, a member of the board of registration? They had agreed to register all these people of Norwood Park; but when they went forward to be put on the registration they found that Corse had gone off and secreted himself; and the registration-list was not to be found. It was only when the election day came that they were permitted to go forward under the law when their votes were challenged, and make oath to their right of suffrage and prove it as they were required to do.

Do not gentlemen on the other side know that even if these men were paupers they are legal voters in the State of Illinois? Do not gentlemen know that there is no provision of statute-law which precludes them? Do not gentlemen know that three members of the Illinois delegation sit here by virtue of elections at which the vote of every inmate of the poor-house who presented himself was received and counted? Do not gentlemen know that at the Soldiers' Home in the State of Ohio 600 votes were polled by the inmates of that eleemosynary institution against one of the members [Mr. MCMAHON] from that State? Do not gentlemen know that in the Lake View precinct of this very district the inmates of the Marine Hospital were marshaled to the polls under the leadership of the warden of that institution, each and every one of whose ballots were polled for Farwell on that day?

But the question of residence is raised, and it is urged that these men could not acquire a residence because of their want of volition; that there must be permanent residence. And why? Because the statute-law of Illinois says it must be permanent residence. I was not surprised to find that no gentleman who has preceded me upon the other side of the House has felt himself called to the task of undertaking to demonstrate that that statute of Illinois was constitutional in its character. The constitution of Illinois does not require permanent residence for a voter. The statute of Illinois can prescribe no qualfications for a voter in addition to those laid down in the constitution. Any statute that attempts to make any addition to or any modification of the qualifications prescribed by the constitution is unconstitutional and void. It is not in the power of any legislature to pass a statute which shall be of superior dignity to the organic law, the constitution of the State.

But it is useless to waste time on that precinct. I here assert, and call the House to bear in mind, that even if these men were all paupers they were still entitled to vote, and no proof to the contrary can be produced. There is no proof in this case that they were paupers at all. The utmost that can be claimed is that there were two paupers out of those fifty-nine voters.

Now, if the sitting member honestly believed that these men were paupers, and if he honestly believed that under the law of Illinois he could exclude their votes, why did he not call for the pay-rolls of that institution? Why did he not call upon the board of county commissioners to furnish a list of those who under their authority had been admitted to that poor-house? It was perfectly competent for him to obtain such proof. It is in evidence that that record was to be had. The testimony in this case shows that there was such a record in existence. He who seeks to disfranchise nearly one-half of the voters of a precinct should have demanded the production of the proper proof. Even if these men were paupers, they had a right to vote. But, I repeat, sir, they are not paupers according to the evidence, and there has been no effort upon the part of the sitting member to demonstrate that fact.

But pretermitting those points, I come to the only remaining question—an important one, for it involves a precedent that needs to be decided. In the first precinct of the twentieth ward Mr. Farwell's returned majority is 171. I need not stop to cite the evidences of frauds perpetrated in that precinct; they are admitted.

At one time it may have been my purpose to denounce the perpetrators of that fraud, but, if so, I have long since abandoned it, for nothing that I could say, no anathemas I could hurl would approximate to the invective and abuse that those gentlemen have received at the hands of their political associates upon the other side of this Chamber. They have said that the officials who conducted the elections in that precinct went to work deliberately and systematically to perpetrate fraud; that they went back to a registration-list which was anterior to the election, and from that point down to the culmination of their iniquity their denunciators have told the truth.

The question presented in the first precinct of the twentieth ward is a very simple one. Will you undertake to purge a poll of its fraudulent votes, or will you, because of evidence of fraud in that precinct, reject the whole poll, when by the adoption of the latter course you give the advantage and make that man the beneficiary of your action whose friends and partisans have perpetrated the fraud? This first precinct of the twentieth ward was overwhelmingly a democratic precinct. So decided was its political complexion that no republican dare make the race for alderman in it. But a man by the name of Corcoran—and his name should be forever remembered in order that it may be handed down in enduring infamy for the crimes he planned, for the iniquities he perpetrated, for the wrongs he inflicted upon that constituency in this contest we are discussing—a man by the name of Corcoran, a partisan of the sitting member, went to work deliberately, with the assistance of four men, to manufacture a fraudulent registry-list. Upon that list they put three hundred fictitious names. When the election came off three out of the four men who made up that fraudulent registry-list are found to be officers of the election in that precinct. They refused to admit a challenger into the room for each party, as the law required. The very men who had made up this fraudulent registry-list, the men who had put these three hundred fictitious names upon it, the very men who had been handling these fictitious names by furnishing them to repeaters, and furnishing those repeaters with the tickets of the sitting member to vote in that precinct—these are the very men who appear as judges and clerks of election at that precinct. These are the very men whose votes stand recorded there for the sitting member. These are the very men who took the ballot-box when the election closed and carried it to their room, and kept it there for two days. These are the very men who it is admitted and agreed upon both sides of this Chamber are responsible for every fraud which was perpetrated throughout that whole day's contest.

I ask this House to bear in mind that neither in his answer, nor in his proof, nor in his argument has the contestee in this case ever charged there was a fraudulent vote polled in that precinct for his competitor—not one.

Now, then, I say under the statute of Illinois you cannot help but purge the poll. The law says you shall never reject a poll until it becomes impossible to purge it of fraud. It is not a question of discretion vested with you. The law says you shall not disfranchise a precinct unless it be absolutely impossible to purge that precinct of its fraud.

I may as well here make citation of the authorities which bear upon this case. In the case of Delano vs. Morgan, in 1868, under almost similar circumstances, the House and the committee refused to reject the poll.

In the case of Hogan vs. Pile, 1869 and 1870, page 281, the majority refused to reject the poll or purge it.

In the case of Van Wyck vs. Green, the majority infer from the politics of officers that fraud was in the interest of their friend.

In Pratt vs. The People, 29 Illinois, page 72, the court said, "An irregularity in an election may be overlooked if it casts no uncertainty on the result and has not been occasioned by the party seeking to derive a benefit from it."

In the case of The People vs. Cook, 4 Selden, 8 New York, page 93, it is held that—

> It is probably impracticable to prescribe a rule which will enable us to determine in all cases what irregularities of inspectors will vitiate an election. It may be safely affirmed that if the irregularity does not deprive a legal voter of his right or admit a disqualified person to vote, if it casts no uncertainty on the result, and has not been occasioned by the agency of a party seeking to derive a benefit from it, it may be overlooked.

In the case of Myers vs. Maffett, (1869-'70, pages 564 and 586,) the majority of the committee and the House refused to throw out a precinct in face of outrageous frauds.

In the case of Van Wyck vs. Green, page 361, the majority of the committee say:

> The committee is of opinion that the irregularities and misconduct of the inspectors of the election at said districts were sufficient to throw out the entire vote of said districts, but does not recommend the same, as contestant did not specifically demand the same in his notice to contestee.

Frauds were here alleged on part of contestee. Now, sir, never in the notice of contest here has it been demanded that this poll should be rejected. We do not want it rejected, because the demands of right, justice, and equity say it shall not be rejected unless you desire to set a precedent under which each and every man may become the beneficiary of his own fraud.

In Littlefield vs. Green, Cass County, Illinois, Brightly's Election Cases, pages 495 and 496—

It is undoubtedly the rule that if the canvassing court can separate the legal from the illegal votes, and reject the illegal ones, they are bound to do so, and that mere irregularities in the manner of conducting an election or a fraud on the part of the officers will not vitiate, unless it be of so gross a character as to destroy all means of ascertaining the true result.

In Biddle and Richard vs. Wing, Clark, and Hall, Contested-Election Cases, page 504, it is held—

Nothing short of the impossibility of ascertaining for whom the majority of votes were given ought to vacate an election.

These are the authorities that bear upon the case; and I see fit only to supplement them by that work prepared by a distinguished member of the present Congress, Mr. McCRARY. In the American Law of Elections, section 303, it is held:

The power to reject an entire poll is certainly a dangerous power. * * * It should only be exercised in an extreme case, that is to say, a case where it is impossible to ascertain with reasonable certainty the true vote.

Here you have the law declaring that you shall not reject the poll of an entire precinct if it be possible to purge it of its frauds. I trust the House will bear this in mind. In the State of Illinois, unlike other States, the statute requires that whenever a man comes forward to vote his name shall be registered on the poll-book, his number shall be put opposite his name, his residence by street and number shall be taken down as given by himself, and then, before his ballot is put into the box, the same identical number corresponding to the one opposite his name must be put upon his ballot. For all practical intents and purposes it was a viva voce vote. Every man's name was numbered, and that same number was written upon every man's ballot. All that you had to do to purge it of its frauds was to prove the illegal votes on the poll-book, take out the corresponding numbers of the ballots, and you had exactly the fraudulent votes that had been introduced into that box. That was done.

The poll-book in this case stands unimpeached. The returns are admitted to be worthless. The poll-books are made the foundation of contestant's case. By them we purge this poll. All parties agree that it has not been altered. We go behind the returns to the poll-books and the ballots. This surely we have a right to do and are required to do. We have the right to go even further. In the case of Fallet vs. Delano it is held:

The contestant alleged that the poll-books were defective; but it was held that, the tally-sheets being unimpeached, the stated results could not be set aside. The House agreed to report without a division. Here the House not only went back to the poll-book, but behind that to the tally-sheets.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the House will bear me out in this: there can be no doubt of the propriety and the justice of deducting one vote for every fraudulent or illegal vote that was proven in that precinct. Up to that point we are agreed. The only question is from whom these fraudulent votes should be deducted. We say deduct them from the man for whom the vote of the corresponding number on the poll-book was given. They say the difficulty is that these ballots have been tampered with, and that there are duplicate and triplicate numbers. That there are 183 ballots in this box that are duplicate or triplicate in number. Grant that. If we were to insist upon the application of the rule which the law permits us, we would be entitled to deduct from the vote of the sitting member one for every fraudulent vote proven in that precinct, because the frauds were all perpetrated by his friends; the ballots, if they were confused and misnumbered, were confused and misnumbered by his partisans. He became the beneficiary by their work, and it would be nothing but fair under the construction of the law to deduct one vote from his count for every illegal vote proven on the poll-book.

For in the case of Duffey, 4 Brewster, page 531, the court held:

Upon notice, &c., that fraudulent votes had been received, the burden of proof falls upon the candidate advantaged by the count to show that the person so voting was a legal voter or voted for his opponent, otherwise it will be presumed that they were polled and counted for him, and the poll will be purged by striking the whole number of such votes from his count.

But I beg you to remember that we do not propose to apply that rule. We do not ask to deduct from the sitting member a single illegal vote, except it be where we have proven by the corresponding number on the ballot that the owner of that ballot gave it to the sitting member. Here are eighty-odd of these ballots that we cannot identify, because, from the manipulations of his friends, they have been numbered to correspond with the numbers of men who voted for both candidates. We propose to leave them untouched, to deduct them from no one. We only propose to deduct from the sitting member's count the number of ballots belonging to illegal voters upon that poll-book that have been proven to correspond with numbers in the poll-books that were given to his count. If you undertake in this way to purge the poll you will take away from the sitting member 252 votes. If you refuse to purge the poll and reject it as an entirety, you only take from him 171 votes.

Is there a doubt in the mind of any man around me as to the candidate for which all those fraudulent ballots were polled? The proof shows that over 300 illegal votes were polled. The proof shows that one of the parties to this contest never received but 251 votes in that precinct, all told. And the proof shows that the sitting member received between four and five hundred. The illegal votes could not have been polled for Le Moyne, because there were more illegal votes than his whole number amounts to. You are not left to inference. You are not left to presumption. It is clearly demonstrated, it comes down into the region of established fact, that there was not a fraudulent vote polled at that precinct that day that was not polled for the sitting member. It has never been contrarily charged. It has never been contended for in proof or in argument; and no man here will have the hardihood to claim it.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I made the charge on yesterday, as the gentleman will find if he will refer to my speech.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky declines to be interrupted.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is a singular thing in the very inception of this contest one party charges fraud in this precinct and the other party denies it. The one party undertakes to prove it and the other to resist it. One party does prove it in spite of the efforts of the sitting member to suppress it. And after that is demonstrated and it is clearly shown that he is to lose 252 votes in that precinct, because of the frauds and villainies of his friends, then for the first time by an amended brief he comes before the committee and begs that you shall reject the whole poll. It will hardly be accepted by this House. I do not believe that the proposition will be supported by the unprejudiced members upon that side; and unless that is done it matters not what you do with Norwood Park; it matters not what you do with the returns from the third precinct of the eighteenth ward; Mr. Le Moyne is elected a member of this House by a majority of 100 votes, in round numbers, in spite of all the frauds and iniquities that were perpetrated on him. If you do not intend to do this thing, if you are resolved to put the seal of your approbation upon such frauds openly perpetrated, if you are determined to set a premium upon fraud, if you are resolved to open wide the doors and gates to the corruption and disreputable practices that have been perpetrated in this contest, then in Heaven's name cease prating about the purity of republican institutions, admit to the world that the "rotten-borough" system of England, which has been held up to universal detestation, has found, not a counterpart in America, but a system far in advance of the iniquities of that English practice and which should raise a blush of shame upon the cheek of every American. There is no way to resist the conclusion reached by the majority of the committee; there is no process of reasoning by which you can bring yourself to believe that this precinct should be rejected for fraud and the vote of the other precinct counted, or that the voters from the poor-house farm should be disfranchised when the law of Illinois says that they shall not be, when even if they were paupers they were entitled to their vote, and there is no proof of their pauperism.

I do assert that this is the first and only case to be found of record in which the party receiving a majority of the votes of a precinct ever demanded the rejection of that precinct because of the frauds admitted to have been perpetrated by his own friends and supporters, and makes this demand, as novel in law as it is foreign to equity, in order that he may profit by these frauds of his partisans.

Why, Mr. Speaker, the State of Illinois is tenacious of the rights of suffrage. The city of Chicago has been noted for many things; it is famed for the rapidity of its growth and its unexampled commercial developments; for its splendid boulevards and palatial structures; it is noted for the magnificent whisky frauds it has developed; it is justly celebrated for its unparalleled and unapproachable conflagration; but there is nothing for which Chicago stands more justly prominent than for the tenacity with which her people cling to the inalienable right of suffrage. While gentlemen on the other side would deprive these alleged paupers of the right to vote, this record shows that the right is not denied even to dead men in Chicago. The grave has been forced to give up its sheeted dead, buried for months and years, in order that they might come to the ballot-box on that 3d day of November when this election occurred and cast their suffrages for Farwell; and one man by the name of Freeman, who had been buried for more than a year, actually voted twice for the sitting member, and yet they tell us that men must be disfranchised because they are poor among such a suffrage-loving constituency as that. [Laughter.]

Now, my friend from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] yesterday, illustrating that modesty for which he is proverbial, compared himself to the heavenly messenger that Abraham was to send to the family of Dives with a message of warning, and he closed his pathetic appeal by stating that the democratic majority here would not listen even though one rose from the dead. I did not think it was more inappropriate or more unseemly that this House should be greeted with the sepulchral tones of a grave-yard advocate, pleading the cause of the sitting member on this floor, than it was that that sitting member should claim his seat on the ballots of men who have been dead and buried until their memory is forgotten. There has been decidedly too much of the grave-yard in this contest. The truth is irrefutable. If Mr. Farwell is to be allowed to reject this poll instead of purging it, when the law says that it shall be purged, and when the law of the State of Illinois makes it plain that you can purge it, he becomes the beneficiary of 82 votes all fraudulent, all illegal, all iniquitous, and, worse than that, you thereby disfranchise two hundred and fifty-one men in that precinct who voted for Le Moyne, which Farwell admits in his answer, and as is shown in the proof and which Mr Farwell admits in his argument, were all legal voters and had a right to vote. If you do that you set a premium upon fraud, you invite every political bummer to come into these contests for the purpose of corrupting the ballot-box and prostituting the right of suffrage. You must go further and say that having rejected that poll for fraud you will refuse to reject the other poll because of frauds equally glaring, and then you must go further still and say that not one single man who voted from the Norwood Park farm in Cook County was entitled to vote, when the laws of the State give him the right of suffrage and when the testimony goes to show that he was as much entitled to it as you were to deposit the last ballot you gave in your own precinct, and when there is not one scintilla of proof to the contrary appearing.

I have only to say, in conclusion, that I trust the action of every member of this House, whether he sits upon this side or the other, will not be influenced by party prejudice or patisan bigotry, but that each will discharge the duty that devolves upon him, taking counsel only of an honest judgment, a fearless and well-formed purpose, heeding less the mutterings of partisans than the promptings of conscience. The case is made out; let the House decide it.

Mr. POPPLETON. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. Will my colleague on the committee yield to me for a moment?

Mr. POPPLETON. I think there has been debate enough upon this case. I simply desire to say that I feel that the time of the House has been sufficiently occupied in the discussion of this case, and that it should now give way to other business of the House, and I insist upon a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SAYLER in the chair.) The question before the House is upon adopting the substitute reported by the minority of the Committee of Elections for the resolutions reported by the majority of the committee.

The Clerk will report the resolutions.

The resolutions of the majority of the Committee of Elections were read, as follows:

Resolved, That Charles B. Farwell was not elected, and is not entitled, to a seat in this House as a member of the Forty-fourth Congress from the third congressional district of Illinois.

Resolved, That John V. Le Moyne was elected, and is entitled, to a seat in this House as a member of the Forty-fourth Congress from the third congressional district of Illinois.

The resolutions of the minority of the committee were read, as follows:

Resolved, That John V. Le Moyne was not elected, and is not entitled, to a seat in this House from the third congressional district of Illinois.

Resolved, That Charles B. Farwell was elected, and is entitled, to a seat in this House from the third congressional district of Illinois.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I rise to a question of privilege. I understood the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] to state that nowhere in the record could be found a return of the judges of the third precinct of the eighteenth ward.

The SPEAKER, pro tempore. That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I simply desire to say that I do not make the point of order that this is not a privileged question; but if the House is to consider it, and to allow the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WELLS] to proceed, I shall certainly expect the courtesy of being allowed an opportunity to reply.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not consider it a privileged question.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I made a statement which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] denies. I desire to read, from page 354 of the evidence in this case, the statement of James S. Fisher, in regard to the making of the returns on the night of the election in the third precinct of the eighteenth ward, in order to show that my former statement was correct.

Question. You have spoken of the judge announcing to you the result. State whether that was done in the presence of the other judges of the election.

Answer. Yes, sir; and the clerk, and publicly announced; read out in a loud voice.

Mr. POPPLETON and others. "Order!" "Order!"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WELLS] is not in order. He is not discussing a question of privilege, but the merits of the case, and the Chair must decline to entertain any further discussion upon it. The question now is, Will the House adopt the resolutions reported from the minority of the Committee of Elections in place of the resolutions reported by the majority of that committee?

The resolutions of the minority of the committee were as follows:

Resolved, That John V. Le Moyne was not elected, and is not entitled, to a seat in this House from the third congressional district of Illinois.

Resolved, That Charles B. Farwell was elected, and is entitled, to a seat in this House from the third congressional district of Illinois.

Mr. BROWN, of Kansas. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 89, nays 129, not voting 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, John H. Baker, Banks, Blaine, Blair, Bradley, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Cannon, Caswell, Conger, Crapo, Crounse, Danford, Darrall, Davy, Denison, Dobbins, Dunnell, Eames, Evans, Fort, Foster, Frost, Frye, Garfield, Hale, Haralson, Hathorn, Hendee, Henderson, Hoar, Hoge, Hoskins, Hunter, Hurlbut, Joyce, Kelley, Ketchum, Kimball, Lamar, Lapham, Lawrence, Leavenworth, Lynch, MacDougall, McCrary, Miller, Monroe, Morgan, New, Norton, O'Brien, O'Neill, Packer, Page, Pierce, Plaisted, Potter, Pratt, Rainey, Robinson, Rusk, Sampson, Seelye, Sinnickson, Smalls, A. Herr Smith, Stone, Stowell, Thornburgh, Martin I. Townsend, Washington Townsend, Tufts, Van Vorhes, Waldron, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, G. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, Whiting, Willard, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, William B. Williams, Wilshire, James Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., and Woodburn—89.

NAYS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Ashe, Atkins, John H. Bagley, jr., Banning, Blackburn, Bland, Blount, Bradford, Buckner, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Candler, Caulfield, Chapin, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Clymer, Cochrane, Collins, Cook, Cowan, Cox, Culberson, Cutler, Davis, De Bolt, Dibrell, Douglas, Durham, Eden, Egbert, Faulkner, Felton, Finley, Forney, Franklin, Fuller, Gibson, Glover, Goode, Goodin, Gunter, Andrew H. Hamilton, Robert Hamilton, Hardenbergh, Henry R. Harris, Harrison, Hartridge, Hartzell, Hatcher, Hereford, Abram S. Hewitt, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hill, Holman, Hooker, Hopkins, House, Hunton, Jenks, Knott, George M. Landers, Lane, Levy, Luttrell, L. A. Mackey, Maish, McFarland, Metcalfe, Milliken, Money, Morrison, Mutchler, Neal, Odell, Parsons, Payne, Phelps, John F. Philips, Piper, Poppleton, Powell, Randall, Rea, Reagan, John Reilly, James B. Reilly, Rice, Riddle, William M. Robbins, Roberts, Miles Ross, Savage, Scales, Schleicher, Sheakley, Singleton, Slemons, William E. Smith, Southard, Sparks, Springer, Stenger, Tarbox, Teese, Terry, Thompson, Thomas, Throckmorton, Tucker, Turney, John L. Vance, Robert B. Vance, Gilbert C. Walker, Walling, Walsh, Warren, Whitehouse, Wigginton, Wike, Alpheus S. Williams, James Williams, James D. Williams, Jeremiah N. Williams, Fernando Wood, Yeates, and Young—129.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Bagby, George A. Bagley, William H. Baker, Ballou, Barnum, Bass, Beebe, Bell, Bliss, Boone, Bright, John Young Brown, Samuel D. Burchard, Burleigh, Campbell, Cason, Cate, Chittenden, Durand, Ellis, Ely, Farwell, Freeman, Gause, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, John T. Harris, Haymond, Hays, Henkle, Hubbell, Hurd, Hyman, Frank Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Kasson, Kehr, King, Franklin Landers, Lewis, Lord, Lynde, Edmund W. M. Mackey, Magoon, McDill, McMahon, Meade, Mills, Morey, Nash, Oliver, William A. Phillips, Platt, Purman, John Robbins, Sobieski Ross, Sayler, Schumaker, Strait, Stevenson, Swann, Waddell, Wait, Charles C. B. Walker, Ward, Erastus Wells, White, Whitthorne, Willis, Benjamin Wilson, and Woodworth—72.

So the resolutions reported by the minority of the committee were not adopted.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I desire to state that I am paired with my colleague, Mr. CASON, who, if present, would vote "ay" and I would vote "no."

Mr. BLACKBURN. My colleague on the Committee of Elections, Mr. BEEBE, of New York, desired me to have the announcement made that he was paired with Mr. BURLEIGH, of Maine. If present, Mr. BEEBE would vote "no" and Mr. BURLEIGH would vote "ay."

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. LEWIS, is absent by order of the House; if present, he would vote "no."

Mr. AINSWORTH. I am paired with my colleague Mr. OLIVER. If present, Mr. OLIVER would vote "ay" and I would vote "no." I desire also to state that Mr. KASSON, of Iowa, is absent on account of the serious illness of his brother.

Mr. G. A. BAGLEY. I desire to state that I am paired with my colleague, Mr. WALKER, who, if present, would vote "no" and I would vote "ay."

Mr. LANE. I desire to state that Mr. MCDILL, of Iowa, and Mr. GAUSE, of Arkansas, are absent on committee service, and are paired. If present, Mr. MCDILL would vote "ay" and Mr. GAUSE vote "no."

Mr. TUFTS. My colleage, Mr. OLIVER, is paired with Mr. BOONE, of Kentucky. If present, Mr. OLIVER would vote "ay" and Mr. BOONE would vote "no."

Mr. AINSWORTH. I announced that I was paired with my colleague, Mr. OLIVER. I find now that he is paired with another gentleman also, and therefore I will vote "no."

Mr. TUFTS. There is evidently a misunderstanding in regard to my colleague, Judge OLIVER. Judge BOONE, of Kentucky, asked me to arrange a pair for him on these questions. Judge OLIVER also spoke to me on the same matter. In his hurry of leaving he made the arrangement with Mr. AINSWORTH, not knowing that I had made any arrangement of the kind with Judge BOONE. Judge OLIVER and Judge BOONE are both absent, and therefore it could make no difference whatever in the result.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs upon adopting the resolutions reported by the majority of the Committee of Elections.

The resolutions of the majority were as follows:

Resolved, That Charles B. Farwell was not elected, and is not entitled, to a seat in this House as a member of the Forty-fourth Congress from the third congressional district of Illinois.

Resolved, That John V. Le Moyne was elected, and is entitled, to a seat in this House as a member of the Forty-fourth Congress from the third congressional district of Illinois.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were adopted.

Mr. POPPLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 3356) authorizing the transfer of a certain appropriation.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 3269) appropriating $50,000 for subsistence supplies for Apache Indians in Arizona Territory and for the removal of the Indians of Chericahua agency to San Carlos agency.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 745) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a register and change the name of the brig A. S. Pennell to the City of Moule.

The message also returned to the House, in accordance with its request, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 34) to print forty-five hundred copies of the annual report of the United States geological and geographical survey of the Territories.

SAMUEL EMMERT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the papers (certified copies) pertaining to the claim of Samuel Emmert; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

CAPTAIN GEORGE A. ARMES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report in the case of Captain George A. Armes, Tenth United States Cavalry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COMMISSARY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of Circular No. 1, from the Office of the Commissary-General of Subsistence; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 40) granting a pension to Elmira E. Cravath;

An act (S. No. 130) to relinquish the interests of the United States in certain lands to the city and county of San Francisco, in the State of California;

An act (S. No. 425) granting a pension to James Eli Butts and Malinda Frances Butts;

An act (S. No. 504) granting a pension to Nancy True; and

An act (S. No. 761) to remove the political disabilities of James E. Slaughter, of Alabama.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Post-Office appropriation bill. Before making that motion I wish to say that inasmuch as many gentlemen desire to speak upon this bill I have thought it advisable to permit general debate upon the bill during the day and to-night, if the House will consent to take a recess from half past four till half past seven o'clock. I ask therefore, in the first instance, that by unanimous consent a recess be taken at half past four o'clock until half past seven o'clock, and that general debate proceed upon this bill at the evening session.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether he proposes that general debate on the bill be closed to-day?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir. I will seek to-morrow to have general debate closed at a very early moment; but I make no such motion now.

Mr. PAGE. Then I make no objection.

Mr. HOAR. Does the request of the gentleman from Indiana for unanimous consent imply that no other business is to be done this evening?

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose that would follow if this afternoon and the evening session be devoted to general debate. It is not proposed to take the bill up for consideration by paragraphs until to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. I think it should be distinctly understood when consent is given that no business, except what connects itself with this bill, is to be taken up this evening.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not intend to include that in my request.

Mr. REAGAN. If that were the understanding I should be inclined to object. I thing this bill deserves very full debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman misapprehends my motion. I am not proposing at this time to close general debate on the bill. I shall, however, to-morrow ask that general debate be closed at a very early hour. I am now simply asking that this afternoon and the evening session be set apart for general debate on this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I did not misapprehend the gentleman. His indication was that there should be a recess and that debate should go on at the evening session with an understanding that no business should be transacted, which I take it would lead to a thin House; and therefore I would object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I was giving no intimation of that kind. That came from the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. HURLBUT. Let it be the understanding that no other business shall be transacted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose it is entirely safe to assume that no other business will be transacted at the evening session; but I cannot speak as to the session to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana, pending the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, asks unanimous consent that at half past four o'clock the House take a recess until half past seven to continue the general debate on this bill.

Mr. RICE. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. What portion of the proposition does the gentleman object to?

Mr. RICE. I move to amend the gentleman's proposition——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent.

Mr. RICE. I object to that for the purpose of getting in my motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. RICE. My amendment is that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2803) to provide for arrears of pension on account of death or wounds received or disease contracted in the service of the United States since the 4th day of March, 1861, and for the payment of the same. I wish to say in this connection that this bill was made a special order for the 5th of April; and from time to time ever since I have tried to bring it up for consideration.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order. I submit that a motion to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of one subject is not amendable by a motion to go into committee upon another subject. The motion to go into Committee of the Whole is always in the form of a motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana did not propose it in that form.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that is the form of the motion always.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall have to make a definite motion which will not be subject to objection. I presume that, if the House desires to go into Committee of the Whole to consider the bill which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICE] desires to bring up, then it will only be necessary to vote down my motion. Therefore, as unanimous consent is not given for a session to-night for general debate, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. RICE. I do not object at all to a session for general debate to-night, but I desire to bring up this bill for consideration. From time to time since the 5th of April it has given way for the consideration of one bill after another, appropriation bills and others.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much time does the gentleman expect to occupy upon that bill?

Mr. RICE. It may perhaps occupy an hour or two; we cannot tell. It is a bill of great importance.

Mr. RUSK. I do not think it will take more than ten minutes to pass the bill.

Mr. RICE. It will take more than that. There are several members who wish to speak upon it. It is a bill which deserves serious consideration, and it ought not to be passed too hurriedly. I have made my motion as an amendment to that of the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the motion of the gentleman from Indiana is to suspend all rules and orders to go into Committee of the Whole on the post-office appropriation bill, the Chair would have to hold that motion not amendable. That is the form of motion prescribed by the rules, though that is not the motion made by the gentleman from Indiana in the first instance.

Mr. ROSS. If the motion be made in that form I shall ask the House to vote it down to allow the consideration of this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before that motion is put, without any reference to the question whether the House goes into Committee of the Whole upon one bill or the other, I ask unanimous consent that a recess be taken to-day from half past four o'clock to half past seven o'clock, in order that the evening session may be devoted to general debate on the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. RICE. I do not object to that.

Mr. HOOKER. I object.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HOLMAN that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill, there were—ayes 113, noes 63.

Mr. COCHRANE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I demand tellers.

Mr. BANNING. Will not the gentleman from Indiana give way to the gentleman from Illinois for half an hour?

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist on my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. RICE. I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess at four and a half o'clock, to meet again at half past seven, to consider the bill to which I have referred.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's motion is not in order, as the House is dividing.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I withdraw my demand for tellers.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee now proceeds to the consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes. The bill will be read a first and second time for information.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move by unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

Mr. DUNNELL. I object.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. I withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no further objection, the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, quite a number of gentlemen have indicated their wish to address the committee on the subject of this bill, and until those gentlemen have spoken who desire to be heard this afternoon and to-night, if a night session is held, the members of the committee will not desire to present their views in regard to measures of reform which they think have been inaugurated by its provisions.

Mr. HOAR. I am desirous of addressing a question to the gentleman from Indiana who has charge of this post-office appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield the floor?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not asking the floor at this time, nor does any gentleman of the Committee on Appropriations. I understand, however, that quite a number of gentlemen desire to be heard, and at an early moment afterward members of the Committee on Appropriations who desire to present the changes of law proposed in this bill will apply for a hearing.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to ask a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will hear the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make an inquiry of the honorable gentleman from Indiana in relation to a matter which interests very much some skilled manufacturers and laborers in my district and State; and that is, whether the committee have considered the complaint of the envelope manufacturers that the Post-Office Department supplies a large portion of the citizens of the country with envelopes at a loss—the envelopes which contain the printed names, and which these manufacturers claim not only destroy their business by having the business of some of their rivals supported by the Government, but also make a considerable tax upon the Government itself? Now, I desire at some convenient time, and I presume this is as convenient to the gentleman from Indiana as any other, to ask whether the committee have considered and acted on that complaint?

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall have to answer in general that the subject has been considered to some extent by a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations; that they have proposed no reform of the existing order of things in this bill.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him further—I do not wish to inquire into the secrets of the committee—whether that failure to propose reform is because they have not got through dealing with the subject, or whether it is because they think no reform is needed?

Mr. HOLMAN. I could not be able to answer that definitely. The Committee on Appropriations thought the subject more properly belonged to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and they have not been able to give the subject that thorough attention, or that degree of attention, which it required.

Mr. HOAR. Then I am to understand the failure to make provision on that subject in this bill does not arise from the committee's having formed an opinion that nothing ought to be done?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; I will say that the committee have reached no result on the subject whatever.

Mr. WOOD of New York. I hope the Chair will state to the committee the precise question before it.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the special order, which is the Post-Office appropriation bill. The first reading of the bill by unanimous consent has been dispensed with, and it is now open for general debate.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Indiana who reports the bill desires to hear discussion by the members of the House and not by members of the committee before the Committee on Appropriations give the House the benefit of their information on the subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. O, no; the gentleman misapprehended my words.

Mr. REAGAN. That is what I understood the gentleman to say.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is directly the reverse of what I said. I understood that quite a number of gentlemen were desirous of being heard on this bill, and that at an early moment afterward the members of the Committee on Appropriations would seek to present to the House the changes of law contemplated by this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. Very well; the gentleman misapprehended what he did say. He said that after having heard speeches, the members of the committee would then seek to be heard. I desired to say then that I desired very much to hear the explanations of the fifth and sixth sections of the bill in reference to the compensation of postmasters, and the seventh and succeeding sections of the bill in reference to the compensation for railroad service. The subjects are placed in a form in the bill so complex and complicated that it is due to the House the committee should give us some information as a basis for the action proposed. In my judgment, some explanation is necessary.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not know anything more unreasonable than the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas. We expect at an early moment to present facts in reference to the bill. The House has resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, and we take it for granted that the speeches made on the bill during the day will be of a general character. Perhaps they will not be made on the bill at all, and you cannot confine them to the bill. It never has been so done upon a general appropriation bill when first brought up for consideration. I do not presume a speech made to-day will have reference to this bill at all.

Mr. STONE. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to discuss the several items appropriated for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1877, those items having been carefully considered by the Committee on Appropriations, although I am firm in the conviction that the large reductions made from the estimates for the postal service for the next year can be sustained by an economical and judicious management of the affairs of the Post-Office Department, such a management as the country has a right to expect from the present Postmaster-General, who justly prides himself upon being a successful business man, and who, in his first annual report, dated November 14, 1874, refers to the desirability of making the Post-Office Department self-sustaining, and says:

> I propose to keep it steadily in view and to direct my best efforts toward its attainment.

A fair measure of success in those efforts can hardly fail to be attained, for the Postmaster-General says further on in the report to which I have just referred:

> I deem it suitable to say here that I propose to guard with strict vigilance the expenditures of this Department, sanctioning no outlay which can be avoided without detriment to the service, and so to conduct its affairs generally that the interests of the public shall be paramount to those of any individual, corporation, or party.

I have no doubt that, with this avowed policy of the Postmaster-General in view, the committee in charge of this bill have been encouraged to cut down the appropriations for the next fiscal year, even though the estimated deficiency submitted by the Postmaster-General for that year is $8,181,602.19, while the estimated deficiency submitted by him for the current year, based upon the administration of his predecessor, was only $7,815,878. The total appropriations made by this bill are $32,189,109

The revenues of the Department and the direct appropriations out of the Treasury amount to 29,508,203

Leaving a deficiency of 2,680,906

to be provided for out of any money in the Treasury.

The difference between the deficiency appropriation made and that estimated by the Postmaster-General will be seen to be $5,500,696.19. And to enable the Postmaster-General to curtail the estimated expenses of his Department to that amount several important provisions have been included in this appropriation bill, to some of which I shall ask the attention of the committee.

Before doing so, however, I will refer to section 4 of the bill, which reads as follows:

> That the annual reports of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to the Postmaster-General shall show the financial condition of the Post-Office Department at the close of each fiscal year and be made a part of the Postmaster-General's annual report to Congress for that fiscal year.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to lay before this House some facts obtained from a critical examination of the annual reports of the Postmaster-General, of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, and of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, which last are made a part of the reports of the Postmaster-General, and from the records of the Department.

Those reports for 1870, 1871, 1872, 1873, 1874, and 1875, to which I have given much study, contain no information which shows the real financial condition of the Post-Office Department at the close of any fiscal year, and the manner of presenting the information the reports do contain is varied from time to time, and stated in such a manner as to prevent almost any person from an attempt to arrive at other conclusions than those expressed by the Postmaster-General himself.

If any gentleman on this floor has had curiosity enough to seek to do this, I am certain that he will agree with me that a more simple and uniform manner of making the report is necessary, and that the real financial condition of the Department should be stated.

In this connection I will call attention to the revenue of the Department, as stated by the Postmaster-General on the first page of his report each year. The Postmaster-General obtains the figures used by him from the Auditor of the Treasury, who by law is required to receive all accounts arising in the Post-Office Department or relative thereto, with the vouchers necessary to a correct adjustment thereof, and to audit and settle the same, and certify their balances to the Postmaster-General.

Many of these accounts from postmasters and others are made directly to the Auditor, and his books must be relied upon for most of the financial statements used by the Postmaster-General in his report, the statements made by the Third Assistant Postmaster-General being in the main from those books.

The Auditor's reports up to and including that for 1869 brought forward each year the balance standing to the credit of the "revenue account" of the Post-Office Department at the close of the previous fiscal year, including the amount of "credit balance accounts" closed by "suspense" during the year, making an estimate of the "bad debts" and "doubtful" or "suspended accounts," and deducting that sum from the gross balance which his books showed to the credit of the "revenue account," so that the amount reported each year was that known or believed to be available for the payment of the indebtedness of the Department for previous years, it being balances in the Treasury and in the hands of postmasters subject to draft or warrant.

The general ledger of the Auditor's Office shows that there was $1,911,715.92 to the credit of this account on the 30th of June, 1869, while the amount shown by the Auditor's report for that year is $1,019,559.88, the difference of $892,156.04 being the estimated amount of the "bad debts," "suspended accounts," &c.

The singular fact has been developed that this available sum of $1,019,559.88 was dropped out by the Auditor in his report for 1870, and no balance is taken up in subsequent reports, which are explained to be a statement of the current receipts and expenditures of the year only.

Inasmuch as the Department draws large sums from the Treasury each year in the form of amounts to meet deficiencies, and the available revenues at the close of the year consist in part of such moneys in the Treasury subject to warrant, the question why this available revenue is not reported or taken into consideration in making estimates for succeeding years is a pertinent one.

The only explanation I have been able to obtain from the present Auditor is that Ex-Postmaster-General Creswell wished it dropped, and as the law did not require the Auditor to report balances from year to year, the request of the Postmaster-General was complied with.

In the reports for 1869, 1870, 1871, 1872, and 1873, the ordinary receipts of the Department, as stated by the Postmaster-General, correspond with that reported by the Auditor, both including the revenue from "money-order business," while in 1874 those receipts are stated to be $24,596,568.84 by the Postmaster-General, and $26,471,071.82 by the Auditor, a difference of $1,874,502.98. Of this sum $1,864,499.98 is accounted for by the Postmaster-General, excluding the revenue from the "money-order business" of $105,198.12, and the amount received for official postage-stamps of $1,759,301.86, both of which amounts the Auditor includes, but this leaves unexplained a difference of $10,003.

Then again in 1875 the Postmaster-General states the revenue to be $26,671,218.50, including the amount received for "official stamps," but excluding the revenue from "money-order business," which was $120,142.19, while the Auditor includes both "official stamps" and the revenue from the "money-order business," and states the ordinary revenue to be $26,791,360.59, or $120,142.19 more than the Postmaster-General.

The different manner of stating the revenue by the Postmaster-General during the last two years to that adopted by the Auditor certainly tends to mislead one who desires to examine into the detailed receipts of the Department.

I have prepared with great care the following statements, and I think they can hardly fail to excite interest. The aggregate amount of receipts from revenue of the Post-Office Department, including amounts drawn from the Treasury under special grants, from July 1, 1868, to June 30, 1875, is $194,482,060.97, and the expenditures of all kinds for the same period aggregate $193,588,792.03. Of the receipts, $156,328,377.20 were from the ordinary revenue of the Department and $38,153,683.77 was from grants drawn from the Treasury for specific objects, and from what are known as "deficiency appropriations."

There remains undrawn of the "deficiency appropriations," as shown by the books of the Auditor's Office, the following amounts, namely:

Deficiency appropriation for—
1869–'70
1870–'71	$14,146 38
1871–'72	3,393 98
1872–'73	680,830 11
1873–'74	1,006,574 51
1874–'75	1,097,842 00
Total	2,802,786 98

Leaving balance of undrawn and available deficiency appropriations $2,802,786.98, as stated by the Postmaster-General on page 4 of his report for 1875. From the published reports of the Auditor of the Treasury, which accompany and are made a part of the Postmaster-General's reports, it will be found that the amount "to the credit of the revenue account on July 1, 1869, was $1,019,559.88, as before stated, which, with the excess of revenue in subsequent years (arising from the ordinary receipts and grants drawn from the Treasury) over the reported expenditures made during those years, less the excess of expenditures over such receipts in other years, leaves a balance July 1, 1875, of $893,268.94, and may be stated as follows:

AUDITOR'S REPORTS.

Revenue on hand and available July 1, 1869		$1,019,559 88
Excess of receipts over expenditures as stated in report of 1872		250,984 06

		574,498 74
Total available		2,741,494 26

and not $1,273,726.58, as stated by the Postmaster-General on page 4 of his report for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1875.

The aggregate amount of appropriations from the Treasury to meet the annual deficiencies in the revenues of the Post-Office Department from 1869 to 1875, both inclusive, is $34,752,329, and from the statements of the Auditor accompanying the annual reports of the Postmaster-General for those years it will be found that there has been drawn from the Treasury under those deficiency appropriations $27,572,986.01, leaving unaccounted for in the published statements of the Auditor, submitted to Congress by the Postmaster-General in the appendix to his reports, the sum of $7,179,342.99. The following is the detailed statement made up from reports of the Auditor and the annual deficiency appropriations for 1869, 1870, 1871, 1872, 1873, 1874, and 1875, act of March 3, 1869, and subsequent acts:

The actual condition of the several deficiency appropriations is shown by the following detailed statement made from the entries as they appear upon the general ledger in the Auditor's Office:

Deficiency appropriation for 1870	$5,740,000
Warrants drawn chargeable to 1870		$2,274,130 47
Covered into the Treasury by Auditor August 1, 1872		2,621,636 00
Covered into the Treasury by Postmaster-General January 7, 1874		844,233 53
		5,740,000 00

Deficiency appropriation for 1871		$4,685,032 00
Warrants drawn and chargeable to 1871	$4,066,934 48
Covered into the Treasury by Postmaster-General January 7, 1874	603,951 14

Deficiency appropriated for 1872		3,969,383 00
Warrants drawn chargeable to 1872	$3,659,253 68
Covered into the Treasury by the Postmaster-General January 7, 1874	306,735 34
		3,965,989 02
Balance undrawn of deficiency appropriation for 1872			3,393 98
Deficiency appropriated for 1873		5,700,970 00
Warrants drawn chargeable to 1873		5,020,139 89
Balance undrawn of deficiency appropriation for 1873			680,830 11
Deficiency appropriated for 1874		5,396,602 00
Warrants drawn chargeable to 1874		4,390,027 49
Balance undrawn of deficiency appropriation for 1874			1,006,574 51
Deficiency appropriated for 1875		5,497,842 00
Warrants drawn chargeable to 1875		4,400,000 00
Balance undrawn of deficiency appropriation for 1875			1,097,842 00
Available balance of deficiency appropriations			2,802,786 98

This agrees with the amount reported by the Postmaster-General on page 4 of his report for the year ended June 30, 1875, while an examination of the Auditor's statements furnished to the Postmaster-General and by him laid before Congress will show an apparent balance of deficiency appropriations of $7,179,342.99, as before stated, or, in other words, that sum remains unaccounted for in any manner by said statements.

An abstract from the Postmaster-General's reports for the fiscal years ended June 30, 1869, 1870, 1871, 1872, 1873, 1874, and 1875 exhibits the amount of the several deficiency appropriations, including $1,500,000 available June 30, 1869, which amounts to $32,489,829, and from the same reports the amount drawn from the Treasury under said appropriations to meet deficiencies is $28,611,294.86, of which amount $1,754,920.01 was covered back into the Treasury, as stated on page 5 of the report of the Postmaster-General for the year ended June 30, 1874, leaving an available balance June 30, 1875, so far as any information can be obtained from the Postmaster-General's reports, of $3,878,534.14.

On page 4, however, of his report for that year the Postmaster-General states the available balance of undrawn deficiency appropriations in the Treasury to be $2,802,786.98, which is found to be the correct amount.

From the reports of the Postmaster-General for the years 1869, 1870, 1871, 1872, 1873, 1874, and 1875 of the deficiency appropriations made by Congress and the amounts drawn from those appropriations, the following will be the exhibit:

	Total drawn from and covered into Treasury		28,611,294 86
	Balance unaccounted for		3,878,534 14
			32,489,829 00

It will be noticed that the total amount of deficiency appropriations, including the balance of $1,500,000, July 1, 1869, amounts to $32,489,829; that the amount drawn from the Treasury, including the amounts stated by the Postmaster-General to have been covered into the Treasury, is $28,611,294.86. On page 4, report of 1875, the Postmaster-General states that there has been drawn on account of payments for previous years from the deficiency appropriations for 1873-'74 $2,039,314.33; $1,545,888.84 of which amount having been drawn in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1874, and included in amount drawn out of this appropriation during the previous year, which amount is stated by the Postmaster-General to be $3,896,602 on page 4 of his report for 1874; consequently $2,039,314.34 must be deducted, leaving $26,571,980 53

To this sum should be added the amounts actually drawn from the appropriations for 1873 and 1874 in 1875, $193,425.49 and $300,000, aggregating 493,425 49

These figures are verified by the statements of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General on page 40, report for 1869; page 33, report for 1870; page 3, report for 1871; page 39, report for 1872; page 21, report for 1873; page 53, report for 1874; page 25, report for 1875, except that it will be found upon reference to pages 52 and 53, report for 1874, that the amount stated as having been received for "newspapers and pamphlets" is $1,392,374.06, and that the statement of the Sixth Auditor on page 276, report for 1874, received for "newspapers and pamphlets" is $1,386,374.06, a difference of $6,000 unaccounted for.

The Sixth Auditor's annual statements of the receipts and expenditures of the Post-Office Department for the years ending June 30, 1869, 1870, 1871, 1872, 1873, 1874, and 1875 show that the appropriations made for "advertising" under sections 3826, 3930, 3931, 3933, 3934, and 3941 of the Revised Statutes modified by an act approved March 3, 1875, making appropriations for the Post-Office Department, will be found to have been exceeded $81,243.82.

This bill appropriates $25,000 for advertising instead of $75,000, as estimated for by the Postmaster-General, and provides that the Postmaster-General shall cause an advertisement of mail-lettings of each State and Territory to be posted up in each post-office therein, to be posted conspicuously for at least sixty days before the time of such letting; but no other advertisement of such lettings shall be required.

This provision is of the greatest importance, as the present law, section 3941 of the Revised Statutes, requires the Postmaster-General to advertise before making contracts for carrying the mails, once a week for six weeks in one or more, not exceeding five, newspapers published in the State or Territory where the service is to be performed, &c. As a regular mail-letting takes place each year in one section (the country being divided into four sections) and special lettings in almost all the States and Territories annually, the cost of the present method of advertising for mail contracts has been enormous and under it there have been many abuses.

I will cite one instance: On the 30th day of October, 1874, the advertisement for mail contracts in the State of Alabama for one year from July 1, 1875, was sent to the National Republican, published at Selma, Alabama, to be printed in that paper once a week for six consecutive weeks, and on the 21st day of December, 1874, the proprietor of that paper, who was also the postmaster at Talladega, Alabama, was paid $3,768 for the printing. Charges having been made of fraud upon the Department in connection with the insertion of this advertisement, an investigation was ordered by the Postmaster-General, which developed the fact that fourteen hundred sheets of what purported to be a supplement of the National Republican, of Selma, Alabama, containing the advertisement had been printed in a job-office at Selma, for which printing $90 was paid, and these supplements having been distributed for six weeks, two bills were prepared against the Post-Office Department for the work, one for about $2,500 and the other for $3,768, with which the postmaster at Talladega came to Washington. Both bills were submitted to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, who, finding that in his judgment it was possible to construe the larger amount to be correct under the law, paid it.

In this way a postmaster who was the proprietor of a country newspaper received a profit of $3,678 on one advertisement. Upon the report of these facts by two special agents of the Post-Office Department who made the investigation, the paymaster at Talladega was removed from office and criminal proceedings commenced against him in Alabama. It was, however, found that he could not be prosecuted in Alabama for collecting an alleged fraudulent claim in Washington, and he was re-instated in office. And singular as it may seem the agents who made the investigation, the postmaster who was investigated, and the Auditor who directed the payment of the bill for $3,768 instead of $2,500 are all to-day officers of the Post-Office Department under the Postmaster-General who ordered the investigation.

There can be no question that the advertisements of mail-lettings, if printed on sheets by the Post-Office Department and distributed to every post-office as proposed in this bill, will reach the people directly interested more effectively and with much less cost than the method now in vogue. The Postmaster-General's reports to which I have before referred contain some interesting facts as to the cost of advertising from 1869 to 1875.

The appropriations made by Congress for "advertising" for those years are as follows, and they are correctly stated on the books of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department:

Section 3679, Revised Statutes, page 728, recites as follows:

No Department of the Government shall expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriation. (Act of July 12, 1870.)

The total cost of advertising for the last fiscal year was $168,381.20, and the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department officially informs me that $140,000 of the amount was paid on account of mail contracts.

Sections numbered 7, 8, and 9 of the bill establishing the rates of compensation to railroads for transporting the mails are in substance those contained in House bill No. 2137, introduced by me and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, modified to some extent, however, to meet the views of the Postmaster-General and the superintendent of railway mail service, an officer of the Post-Office Department, who, from years of practical experience in connection with that branch of the service, understands the subject fully.

The question of adjusting the pay of railroad companies for carrying the mails upon a basis which shall be just toward the Government and at the same time pay a fair rate to the railroads for the accommodations the Government demands of them, is one of great importance. For a proper understanding of the relations of the Government to this class of mail-contractors it will be necessary to consider the changes which have taken place in the manner of separating or distributing the mails for different sections during the past twelve years. Prior to 1864 this work had been done at certain large post-offices throughout the country, selected by the Postmaster-General to make a detailed distribution of mail for the section immediately about them and to make up packages and bags of mail for other distributing offices. Take, for example, mail from the East for my own State. Under the old system it was collected at the various distributing offices and sent to Chicago or Saint Louis, where separate packages or bags were made up for each post-office in the State. These packages or bags were dispatched over the several railroad lines in charge of baggage-men or officers known as route-agents, who delivered and received the mail in bulk at each station. This manner of distributing the mails caused many vexatious delays, letters often having to pass through several separating or distributing offices and, missing a connection with outgoing trains at each of those offices, arrived at their destination long after a passenger starting at the same time the letters were mailed. This gave rise to constant complaints, especially as clerks at distant distributing offices, finding it impossible to remember the location of the smaller post-offices in a State, would send a letter to Chicago for distribution which should be sent to Saint Louis, or vice versa, thereby causing unnecessary delays. To expedite the transmission of mail and relieve the Department from the necessity of increasing the number of distributing offices and building or renting larger post-offices as the business of the country increased became a necessity, and the postal car, or traveling distributing post-office, was introduced and is now in operation on most of the main or trunk lines of railroads. Under this system letters pass from point to point as rapidly as passengers traveling by the same trains, and a letter for a town in Missouri instead of being bagged to Chicago or Saint Louis, to lay there twelve or twenty-four hours, by some clerk in Boston, for example, who, perhaps, never heard before of the town to which the letter is directed, passes now from clerk to clerk until it reaches the hands of one upon a western railroad who handles mail for the place daily and sends it promptly to its destination. This system of distributing the mails while they are in transit requires larger and better mail-cars than were formerly in use.

The volume of mail matter has been from year to year steadily on the increase, as shown by the revenues of the Department derived from the sale of stamps, and stamped envelopes, and postages collected in money.

Those items, as shown by the Postmaster-General's report for 1869, page 112, were, $16,369,886.51; while for 1875, page 230, they were $25,357,276.22; an increase of $8,987,389.71. Of course the trunk lines of railroads, which are the highways of travel and communication between the large cities and the rest of the country, are naturally affected the most by this increased mail, and when gentlemen consider that, instead of increasing the number and size of distributing post-offices at the termini of those trunk lines of railroads, the railroad companies are almost annually called upon by the Government to furnish more car space on their passenger trains to do the distribution of the mail. I think all will be willing to admit that some basis of paying for that space should be fixed which will enable the Department to obtain from the railroad companies necessary accommodations on all trains which the public interests demand should carry mails. In discussing this question I shall assume, first, that it is necessary for the Post-Office Department to have exclusive control of the apartments set aside for the use and transportation of the mails and the agents in charge of the same, and have the right to carry in those apartments all the mail to be transported over the line, be it more or less, within of course the carrying capacity of the car space they occupy; second, that the portion of each passenger train set apart for and run for the exclusive benefit of the Post-Office Department should be paid for at such a rate as will be a fair compensation to the railroad companies for the services rendered by them to the Department.

This subject has been thoroughly investigated and discussed by the Department and by the Senate Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard of the Forty-third Congress, who indorse the space basis of adjusting pay, and the Postmaster-General and the officer of the Department known as the superintendent of railway mail service also give it their unqualified indorsement.

So far as I have been able to ascertain, there is no difference of opinion between any of the gentlemen who have studied the subject as to the fairness of the proposition urged by the railroad companies, that the Government should pay for the car space used by them in transporting or distributing the mails.

If these gentlemen are right, and as a business man I do not see how the correctness of their position can be questioned, it only remains to settle what is a fair rate of compensation per foot of car space used exclusively by the Government for the mails. To this point I ask particular attention, for it is one upon which there is a wide difference of opinion, and I propose to treat it as a simple business proposition. The Government should, I claim, be a preferred customer, and requiring as it does a certain amount of space daily on nearly every passenger-train run, it should pay commutation rates for that space, and at such a figure as would yield the railroads a fair percentage of profit upon the cost of running the portion of the train the Post-Office Department occupied.

We all know that railroads make special commutation rates for persons who travel regularly over their roads, issuing annual or quarterly tickets to them. A passenger occupies a trifle less than one foot of linear full-width car space; and if you are in a position to say to a railroad company that you will arrange to send fifty-five passengers over their road both ways daily, they will furnish a fifty-foot passenger-coach and take the passengers at commutation rates. The Government should be able to engage a car or a part of a car on the same trains at as low a rate per foot of space for each mile the car is run as the commutation rate you would pay per mile for a passenger under the arrangement to which I have just referred. The average weight of men is about one hundred and forty pounds, as shown by Haswell's Engineers and Mechanics' Hand-Book, and fifty-five men at this rate would weigh seventy-seven hundred pounds. As a passenger-coach is much more expensive and is heavier than the average mail-car of the same size, and as few if any mail-cars carry an average weight of over five tons or 10,000 pounds of mail, (which is of course very bulky,) I think the comparison between the rate per foot of car space used for the mails in a passenger-train with the same amount of space in the same train which would be occupied by a passenger a fair one. The best data to be obtained as a guide to what the commutation rate for passengers would be is perhaps to be found in the annual reports of the railroad commissioners appointed by the Legislature of Massachusetts to report annually all facts of public interest in connection with railroads, especially in the New England States. In their seventh annual report, dated January, 1876, these gentlemen, who are not officially connected with railroad companies, and one of whom, Charles F. Adams, jr., has given years of study to the subject, state "the season-ticket rate for long distances to be five and six-tenths mills per mile." Their report made in January, 1874, shows the rate to be six mills, and that is the rate adopted in the bill now before the committee for each foot of car space which may be used by the Government for the mails for each mile the cars are run, attached to trains run regularly at a rate of speed not exceeding twenty-five miles per hour. Trains run for accommodation of passengers at the low rates I have mentioned are slow local trains; and while there can be no question but that they pay on account of the number of passengers carried, (those trains being run only for limited distances in the vicinity of large cities,) they would not pay if run long distances at a high rate of speed and with limited patronage.

It is an admitted fact among railroad men that the cost of running trains at a high rate of speed increases in a much greater ratio than the increase of speed, and it has been claimed by them while this bill has been under consideration that the minimum rate of speed should be lower than twenty-five miles per hour. That minimum has, however, been adopted because it will establish a uniform rate of compensation for the greater part of the service. Comparatively few trains which the Department uses or desires to use being run regularly at a higher rate of speed, the rate of six mills per foot it is believed will pay a profit for service done at the rate of twenty-five miles per hour; and if the roads running those trains get smaller profits than the roads on which the trains run slower they carry more mail, and consequently, furnishing more space and having more custom, can afford to do the work cheaper. That, however, the Department may not be excluded from using the express-trains run at a higher rate of speed than twenty-five miles an hour and at greater cost on account of wear and tear, &c., I introduced for reference to and consideration of the Committee on Appropriations a bill fixing a rate of compensation upon the recommendation of the Postmaster-General, sustained before the committee by strong arguments by Mr. Vail, the superintendent of railway mail service, of seven mills per foot of space furnished on trains run regularly from twenty-five to thirty miles an hour, eight mills for trains run regularly from thirty to thirty-five, and nine mills for trains run regularly above thirty-five miles per hour. These rates have the indorsement of the Postmaster-General and the present superintendent of railway mail service, although the minimum rate recommended by them was six and one-fourth instead of six mills for twenty-five miles and under, seven mills for thirty miles, and an increase of one mill per foot for each five miles per hour of additional speed. That would give ten mills for speed from forty to forty-five miles, eleven mills from forty-five to fifty, twelve mills from fifty to fifty-five, and thirteen mills from fifty-five to sixty miles per hour.

The bill reported by the committee recognizes, however, no higher rate of speed than thirty miles per hour, and will, I believe, result in practically excluding the mails from the express passenger-trains run at a higher rate of speed than thirty miles an hour. It will perhaps be well to state here that the rate demanded by the railroads for all postal-car service has been thirteen mills per linear foot, and that favored by the Senate select committee, before referred to, and Mr. Bangs, the former superintendent of railway mail service, as an average rate was eight mills per linear foot.

I regret that the committee have not deemed it best to adopt a provision to relieve the railroads from doing mail-messenger service for the Post-Office Department; for while it is a comparatively small matter, it has been a just cause of complaint on the part of the railroad companies. The Senate Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard say on this subject in their report:

Your committee are of the opinion that the complaint of the railroad companies in respect to their present obligation to transport the mails between stations on the line of their routes and post-offices not more than one-fourth of a mile distant from stations is well founded, and that such service should not be required, inasmuch as it is a service outside of the usual and ordinary business of such companies.

Section 9 provides "that the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to adjust," &c. This provision will enable him to regulate the amount of space to the necessities of the service, thereby reducing the cost of transporting the mails by railroads to a large amount.

Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk letters of the Postmaster-General of date of March 2 and March 22, which I ask to have read and published with my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 2, 1876.

SIR; I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the letter from you as chairman of the subcommittee inquiring as to the effect of the passage of a bill inclosed (H. R. No. 2137) to fix the rates of compensation for transporting the mails.

There can be no doubt but that the bill referred to recognizes the true principle upon which the payment to railroad companies for mail transportation should be based.

Under the present system of mail transportation and distribution space is one of the first elements to be considered, as the bulk of the distribution is now performed upon the cars while the mail is in transit, and of course the relations of space necessary and weight carried vary considerably under the different circumstances of the different roads.

Under the present system the compensation for mail transportation is very unequally divided, and oftentimes bears little proportion to the service performed.

Last winter there was proposed an estimate of the cost of mail transportation based upon linear space estimated at eight mills per foot. This estimate covered all roads upon which the pay had been re-adjusted under the law of 1873, with the following results:

Compensation under law of 1873	$7,918,972
Compensation based upon the rate of eight mills per linear foot of car space in actual service	7,581,444

In the bill the rate is fixed at six and seven mills respectively for route-agent and postal cars. The linear space in use is about equally divided between route-agents and postal cars. This would bring the average compensation per linear foot to six and one-half mills; reducing the compensation, computed at eight mills, from $7,581,444 to $6,163,714.

Compensation based upon the rate of six and seven mills respectively per linear foot	$6,163,714
The compensation to railroad companies for mail transportation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, was	$9,216,518
The compensation based upon linear space at the average rate of six and a half mills would be about	7,200,000
A reduction of	2,016,518

In answer to your inquiry relating to the pouches necessary to be sent outside of the mail-cars, no estimate could be made that would be correct, as the number of bags varies with the road, the service upon the route, and the country through which it passes. I think the method of compensating them provided in this bill would be exceedingly difficult to carry out, and would suggest that it be changed to space; that is, every three months estimate the space necessary for that service by inspection, and pay for it at the same rates provided for route-agent cars In the estimate for linear space made above, no reference was had to the width of the apartments for route-agents, nor to superfluous or deficient space.

If any law was passed compensating according to space, this of course would be re-organized, and it is hardly probable that the total space for both, baggage, route-agent, and postal-car service, would increase the expense from $300,000 to $500,000 above the estimate.

Very respectfully,

MARSHALL JEWELL,
Postmaster-General.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 22, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the following letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 17, 1876.

SIR: What will be the entire cost of railroad mail transportation under the features of House bill No. 2137?

What will the terminal and side service cost? What will be the cost of railroad travel for agents?

What will be the probable increase from year to year in mail transportation if House bill No. 2137 is adopted?

What is the estimate for railroad transportation for fiscal year ending June 30, 1877?

Very respectfully,

WM. S. HOLMAN,
Chairman Subcommittee Post-Office Appropriation Bill.

Hon. MARSHALL JEWELL,
Postmaster-General.

In reply the following is submitted: The entire cost of railroad mail transportation under the features of House bill No. 2137 will be from seven millions to seven millions five hundred thousand dollars for the car and apartment service.

The cost of the terminal and side service can be estimated very closely The entire cost for mail-messenger service performed by the Department for the year ending June 30, 1875, was $621,311. This includes the service in all the large cities and at all offices over eighty rods from the railroad depots. The cost of the service now performed by the railroad companies cannot in any case amount to three-fourths of this, after deducting the amount now paid for mail-messenger service at offices upon steamboat routes, which is about $40,000.

This would make the probable cost of the service to be assumed by the Department between four hundred and twenty-five thousand and four hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

The cost of railroad travel for agents under section 4 of this bill will amount to about $15,000 annually. The Department has now sixty-four agents who are entitled to free transportation and who travel quite extensively. Allowing one hundred miles of travel each working day, which is a very large estimate indeed, the traveling done by each agent would amount to about $220 per annum, or little over $14,000 annually for all. The probable increase from year to year under the feature of space payment will be considerably less than that if the payment for weight carried is continued. The weight of mail steadily increases, and the increase in compensation to railroads for weight carried will not be much less than 10 per cent. each year. The space necessary will not increase in proportion with the weight for reasons set forth in detail upon pages 8, 9, and 10 of accompanying pamphlet, entitled, "Discussion of the proper method of compensation to railroads for the transportation of the mails." In the past the increase in car space from year to year has been slight. If a basis of compensation according to space and speed were adopted, there would be some reduction the first year, from the fact that there are a number of railway post-office lines established upon railroads that were willing to grant facilities that could be abandoned as soon as the Department was put in a position to get from any railroad the facilities desired, and keep that established since June 30, 1875, on the great trunk lines.

The estimated cost of railroad mail transportation for the year ending June 30, 1877, is $10,500,000.

In connection with this I would beg leave to submit the following regarding the general features of a bill governing railroad transportation of the mails. It cannot be doubted but that the space basis is the real method of compensation. It needs no argument in its favor. And this should apply to mails transported in baggage-cars as well as those in mail cars or apartments.

The feature of incorporating lines 9, 10, and 11 in section 2, requiring cars and mail to be put on all trains as the Postmaster-General may direct, &c., will be opposed by all railroad companies, unless there is some provision made for increased compensation for increased speed. We only require this feature of speed to apply to the through or trunk lines in all sections. As for the local service, a uniform rate could apply, but for through mails it is essential that the most direct transit be obtained. The difficulty heretofore has been that, the railroads getting no more for speedy service than for slow; the through postal cars were put upon the trains leaving at hours not the best adapted to the dispatch of mails; while if a simple provision were inserted that in all cases where the service required entire cars (which would only apply to the trunk lines connecting the different sections of country) a minimum compensation should be paid, say for service under twenty-five miles per hour with an increase of speed. This minimum amount should be below that paid for parts of cars, say six and a quarter mills for twenty-five and under, seven mills for thirty miles, and an increase of one mill per foot for each increase above thirty up to and including each five miles per hour additional speed. This feature would then apply to all time, whether the rate per foot or rate of increase be changed or not.

When it is understood that there are comparatively few lines of road upon which the average speed is above twenty-five miles per hour and very few where above thirty miles per hour, your committee will see that the increased expense will be comparatively light, but at the same time it would give the public the benefit of the fastest speed that can be obtained between the distant sections of our country. And also when the fact is considered that these express trains are the ones with which the local trains at all intersecting points connect, the importance of the Department having control of those trains will be seen, and the Department could not get in the best trains except by praying more for fast service than slow without continually having unpleasant friction with the railroad companies, which is always disastrous to a first-class service.

As this bill will probably make provision for the service for years to come, it would be well to recognize this broad feature and put the railroad companies and the Department upon relations that would be as pleasant as possible. They might object to the rate per foot as being too small, but if it recognizes the underlying principles of railroad transportation, the chief difficulty would be removed.

Very respectfully,

MARSHALL JEWELL,
Postmaster General.

Hon. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN,
Chairman Subcommittee Post-Office Appropriation Bill.

Mr. STONE. Sections No. 11, 12, and 13 propose modifications and changes in the laws governing the appointment and salaries of special agents of the Post-Office Department. Those laws are sections 4017, 4019, and 4020 of the Revised Statutes, and it would seem that there should be no misunderstanding as to the salary such agents are entitled to under the law, as section 4017 provides that "such agents shall be entitled to a salary at the rate of not more than $1,600 a year each," and section 4020 that the Postmaster-General may appoint two agents to superintend the railway postal service, each of whom shall be paid out of the appropriation for the transportation of the mail a salary at the rate of $2,500 a year.

The amount which can be paid as salary to agents appointed under the authority conferred by section 4017 is optional with the Postmaster-General, provided he does not pay more than $1,600 a year, while the salaries of the two agents whose employment is authorized by section 4020 are fixed at $2,500, and the duty for which they may be appointed is clearly defined, although whether such agents shall be employed is left to the discretion of the Postmaster-General.

The law provides that special agents shall be allowed for traveling and incidental expenses a sum not exceeding $5 a day, and of late years this has been construed to mean that this per diem allowance can be made for every day in the year without regard to where or how the agent is employed, even though engaged in clerical duty in the Department at Washington or at some place where the agent may reside.

In this way many agents whose compensation as salary is fixed at $1,600 receive in addition during the year $1,825 for per diem allowance for traveling and incidental expenses, when no traveling expenses are incurred and no incidental expenses except such as any clerk or officer of the Government incurs who has a fixed abode, incidental expenses being allowed in many cases in addition to what is really a fixed salary of $3,425, which is certainly a clear violation of law.

While there may possibly be an honest difference of opinion as to the legality of making a daily annual allowance for traveling and incidental expenses where none are incurred, the accountability of officers who have put such a construction upon the law since June, 1874, is clearly shown by the sixth clause of an act making appropriations for the support of the Army, approved June 16, 1874, which will be found on page 72, volume 18, Statutes at Large, part 3, and is as follows:

Provided, That only actual traveling expenses shall be allowed to any person holding employment or appointment under the United States, and all allowances for mileage and transportation in excess of the amount actually paid are hereby declared illegal, and no credit shall be allowed to any disbursing officer of the United States for payment or allowances in violation of this provision.

That this law is applicable to special agents of the Post-Office Department is shown by the seventh section of an act regulating fees and costs, and for other purposes, approved February 22, 1875, and found on page 334 of the volume of the statutes before referred to.

This section expressly exempts only attorneys, marshals, or clerks of courts of the United States, and their assistants or deputies, from the operation of this law, in relation to the allowance of actual expenses, for a period of six months from July 1, 1874, and makes the law applicable to them after January 1, 1875.

The amount of money allowed to persons holding appointments as special agents of the Post-Office Department since July 1, 1874, in direct violation of law, amounts to tens of thousands of dollars, and the persons who are responsible are the Postmaster-General and the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department.

From the last annual report of the Postmaster-General I have obtained some facts in relation to special-agent service which are of interest.

On page 17, report for 1875, the Postmaster-General states "the number and aggregate compensation of special agents to be forty-eight, at a cost of $160,923.49;" excess of appropriation, $923.49. In a subsequent statement in detail furnished the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department taken from the Auditor's books, for the year ended June 30, 1875, the Postmaster-General reports an error in twice charging $250, and states the amount of compensation to be $160,673.49; excess of appropriation, $673.49.

The Postmaster-General's report also furnishes a statement of amount paid special agents, according to Auditor's report, for year ended June 30, 1875, by quarters, as follows:

September 30, 1874	$39,282 01
December 31, 1874	35,673 78
March 31, 1875	38,138 91
June 30, 1875	37,599 08
Total	150,693 78

This shows a difference of $10,229.71 between the amount stated by the Postmaster-General and the Auditor in the published reports.

The Auditor furnishes a subsequent report in detail, which states:

Salary of special agents	$87,481 31
Per diem of special agents	61,840 50
Incidental expenses of special agents	9,746 73
Total	159,068 54

A difference of $8,374.76 between the amount stated in published report and that of the subsequent report in detail, giving the name of each special agent employed, per diem, and incidental expenses.

In this connection I desire to call the attention of Congress and the country to the fact that as now constituted the Office of the Auditor of the Treasury is not a proper check upon the operations of the Post-Office Department. While nominally independent, that officer is to a great extent under the control of the Postmaster-General, and, being brought into almost daily contact with him, the Auditor, if a weak or subservient man, gradually drops into the position of a Bureau officer of the Post-Office Department, and shields himself for irregular or illegal transactions behind the verbal or written orders of the Postmaster-General.

Let me claim your attention while I cite one case in point. The law which I have before referred to (section 4020 of the Revised Statutes) says the Postmaster-General may appoint two special agents at an annual salary of $2,500, with an allowance for traveling and incidental expenses while actively employed in the service of not more than $5 a day. May appoint them for what? "To superintend the railway postal service;" not for any duty the Postmaster-General may see fit to assign them, but for specific, defined duty.

The necessity for more than one agent to superintend the railway postal service with the aid of agents known as assistants has never been recognized by the Postmaster-General. But the law gives him the power to appoint two, and Ex-Postmaster-General Creswell took advantage of the law and appointed a confidential agent to the position; but, there being no necessity for this man's services, or his whole services, to do the work for which the place was created, he was given other duty to perform, in fact made chief of special agents of mail depredations, who are appointed under section 4017 of the Revised Statutes, and for whose payment a special appropriation is made by Congress each year. This man was allowed an annual salary of $2,500 and $5 a day for three hundred and sixty-five days, or $1,825, making a virtual salary of $4,325 with allowances to the amount of hundreds of dollars in addition.

Can any gentleman say that this was not in violation of law? Well, notwithstanding the enactment of the law of June 16, 1874, to which I have directed your attention, the present Postmaster-General, in November, 1874, appointed his confidential agent to this position, and I hold in my hand the official list of special agents, dated August 15, 1875, and signed by Marshall Jewell, Postmaster-General, in which this agent appears as chief special agent; and upon inquiry I find that what has heretofore been a division of mail depredations under the Second Assistant Postmaster-General has in reality been created a bureau of the Post-Office Department, with this man as a bureau officer, with an annual salary of $4,325 and additional allowances, and that the chief of division for the office of mail depredations, an officer for whose payment an annual salary is appropriated by Congress, has become the chief clerk of that bureau.

In the estimates for appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, page 51 of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting estimates for that year, you will find that only $2,000 is asked for the chief of division of mail depredations, which is reducing his salary $500 and putting him on a par with other chief clerks of bureaus in the Post-Office Department; no mention, however, is made of the fact that a person paid $4,325 out of the appropriation for mail transportation is put over this officer, and that what appears to be a reduction of $500 is really an increased expenditure of $3,825. Even now we have a full-fledged bureau in the Post-Office Department over which illegally presides an officer not known to the law, drawing a salary over $800 in excess of the Assistant Postmasters-General, and holding his office at the will and pleasure of the Postmaster-General, while they are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. And this man controls scores of agents, secret as well as those regularly appointed, who at his beck and call investigate the affairs of any of our constituents.

His accounts have each month for over a year been passed by the Auditor and improperly paid out of the appropriation for the transportation of the mail in view of the duties assigned him; and yet, though his position has been officially published, and his office is in the same building and but a few doors away, the Auditor denies all knowledge of this irregular business until within a few weeks past.

Section 4020 of the Revised Statutes, as modified in this bill, fixes a limit to the amount which can be paid for special agents to superintend the transportation of the mails and for special duty in connection with the money-order business. At present there is no limit to the number of these agents, as they are paid out of the appropriation for the transportation of the mails. The amount paid as salaries to persons employed in handling the mails, outside of those regularly employed as clerks in post-offices and for superintending the transportation of the mails, has increased enormously since 1869.

On page 108 of the Postmaster-General's report for 1869, mail-transportation account is charged with the salaries of route, special, and local mail-agents, postal railway clerks, baggage-masters, &c., amounting to $916,804.62; on page 152 of the Postmaster-General's report for 1870 the same items amount to $1,079,890.41. On page 111 of the Postmaster-General's report for 1871 the same items amount to $1,321,694.33; on page 225 of the Postmaster-General's report for 1872 the same items are $1,605,274.98, (including the salaries and per diem of the assistant superintendents of the postal-railway service stated separately in this report for the first time, which are $35,305.66;) on page 195 of the Postmaster-General's report for 1873 the same items are $1,877,521.34, (including the salaries of assistant superintendents of the railway service, amounting to $46,626.96;) on page 275 of the Postmaster-General's report for 1874 the same items are $2,171,862.87, (including the salaries, &c., of the assistant superintendents of postal-railway service, amounting to $56,098.04;) on page 226 of the Postmaster-General's report for 1875 the same items are $2,333,739.55, (including the salaries, &c., of assistant superintendents of postal-railway service, amounting to $53,768.82.)

This item does not, however, represent one-half of the cost of superintending the postal-railway service, it being the compensation of the chiefs or Bureau officers, who have scores of railway postal clerks detailed to do office duty under them and who are paid salaries at the rate of $1,400 per annum. The law authorizing the employment of clerks in railway postal offices is section 4025 of the Revised Statutes. That law is as follows, and it contains no provisions, I claim, which warrant making men employed under it clerks to special agents:

> The Postmaster-General may appoint clerks for the purpose of assorting and distributing the mail in railway post-offices, each of whom shall be paid out of the appropriation for transportaion of the mail a salary at the rate of not more than $1,400 a year each to the head clerks, nor more than $1,200 a year each to the other clerks.

In 1869 there were one superintendent and five assistant superintendents of railway mail service. There are now two superintendents and ten assistant superintendents' salaries charged to mail transportation, and it is proposed to reduce the number to one superintendent and six assistant superintendents. During the past five years distribution schemes covering the whole country have been prepared and printed for the use of those who distribute the mails, and the large number of persons now employed, costing over $125,000 per annum, can hardly be necessary to keep those schemes corrected and see that the railway clerks and route-agents do their work properly.

As an evidence of how utterly unreliable statements made of the liabilities of the Post-Office Department are let me call your attention to page 4 of the Postmaster-General's report for 1872. The estimated liabilities on June 30, 1872, were:

Balances to foreign countries	$197,400 00
Mail service under contract and recognized, but not yet reported	411,635 15
Mail service still unrecognized	185,705 00
Total	794,740 15

Now, turn to page 4 of the report for 1873, and you will find that to pay these estimated liabilities there was drawn from the Treasury of the amount appropriated—

1869-'70	$152,225 00
1870-'71	978,000 00
1871-'72	535,000 00
Making a total drawn, to pay liabilities estimated at $794,740.15, of	1,665,225 00

Among the tens of thousands of Federal office-holders (51,177 in the Post-Office Department) authorized by law there are many who render little if any service to the Government; and I protest against the assumption of the right by the head of any Department to create bureaus and illegally appoint men to take charge of them, and in the interest of a plundered and overtaxed people I protest against the careless and irresponsible manner in which the accounts of the Post-Office Department are settled and reported by the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department.

THE ADMISSION OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, the bill for the admission of New Mexico now pending before this House, and which has already received the sanction of the Senate, is one of far more than ordinary importance. The question of the admission of a new State to this Republic, clothing it with all of the powers and responsibilities and conferring upon it the dignity of a sovereign American State, is one of great moment both to the Territory making application and to the Government of the United States. In deciding the question in the present instance I trust that considerations other than those of a mere partisan character will convince our judgment and influence our action. A political advantage to either party, as that of securing the electoral vote of the new State, or of two Senators in Congress, or the vote of a Representative upon this floor, will be secured at too great a price, unless the people of New Mexico desire this change in their form of government and are well qualified for the exercise of the high prerogatives of sovereignty.

We are confronted then, sir, at the very threshold of this discussion with the inquiry whether within the limits of this Territory the material prosperity is such and the character and numbers of the population such as to entitle it to the honor of a place among the States of this Union.

Mr. Chairman, an examination of this question has satisfied me that to pass this bill would be an act of mistaken kindness to the citizens of New Mexico, and of gross injustice, irreparable in its character, to the Government of the United States. Will any gentleman upon this floor assign any reason for the statement that the people of this Territory will be benefited by a change from the simple and relatively inexpensive form of government they now enjoy to that of the complicated and expensive machinery of a State government? I frankly confess that this argument would have but little force provided this Territory actually possessed the requisite population and material prosperity to entitle it to the high dignity it seeks at our hands, but in the total absence of these the argument is all-powerful.

Then, sir, placing our advocacy of this bill or opposition to it upon higher grounds than those of mere party advantage, let us in the light of history and guided by the most reliable advices that can be obtained as to the population, prosperity, and probable future of this Territory decide whether this bill should become a law and New Mexico invested with the powers and grave responsibilities of a State.

Mr. Chairman, my opposition to this bill is based mainly, but not wholly, upon the absence of the requisite population in the Territory. New Mexico possesses an area of 121,201 square miles, stretching from the Territory of Colorado upon the north to Texas and Mexico upon the south and Arizona upon the west. Numerous mines of silver, gold, copper, iron, and salt are to be found within its limits. Two great chains of the Cordilleras pass through the eastern portion of the Territory from north to south, while it is watered by the Colorado, the Pecos, the Gila, and the Rio del Norte.

And yet, sir, with the advantages I have mentioned, what has been the progress of this Territory in material wealth and prosperity, in the arts and sciences, in population, in all the elements of power and greatness, in everything that will fit a people for the high exercise of sovereignty, during the last two centuries?

It must be borne in mind, sir, that New Mexico has a history long anterior to that of our Federal Government. As far back as 1595 the viceroy of Mexico, by his envoy, took formal possession of this territory in the name of Spain, and gave it the name of New Mexico. With the exception of an interval extending from 1680 to the year 1698, during which time the natives were in successful revolt against their conquerors this territory remained under Spanish authority and dominion until the year 1846, when it was conquered by United States troops under General Kearney. The celebrated treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was entered into in 1848, between commissioners upon the part of the United States and of the republic of Mexico, by the terms of which treaty this territory was ceded to the United States forever; and Congress on the 9th day September, 1850, in pursuance of that treaty, provided New Mexico with its present territorial government.

Mr. Chairman, as we are now considering the propriety of erecting New Mexico into a sovereign State, it is well to inquire what has been the progress of this Territory in all of the elements that are necessary constituents of a State during the two hundred and sixty-one years that have elapsed since Juan de Onate took possession of it in the name of Spain, and gave it the name it now bears. At the time its present territorial organization was conferred upon it, a little more than a quarter of a century ago, its population was 61,547; ten years later, as shown by the Federal census of 1860, its population had increased but little more than 30,000, it then being 93,516. After another decade of years, as appears by the census of 1870, the population was only 91,874. It is but just, however, to state that between the years 1860 and 1870 a portion of its original territory had been attached to Colorado and Arizona, which will in some measure account for the falling off in population during the ten years immediately preceding the year 1870; but the figures above given show the actual population of the present Territory of New Mexico at the time of taking the last Federal census. It must not be forgotten that the present limits of the Territory of New Mexico embrace an area of 121,201 square miles—an area double that of the State of Illinois and almost three times the size of the State of New York.

Thus we have, sir, a Territory with a population of only 91,874 persons—so far as reliable data can be obtained—applying for admission as a State. But here let us pause for a moment and inquire as to the character, nativity, advancement, and intelligence of this handful of people who seek the honors and responsibilities of statehood at our hands.

Mr. Webster, then a Senator in Congress from Massachusetts, in a speech delivered in the Senate of the United States on the 23d of March, 1848, upon the then recent conquest of California and New Mexico, used the following language, which I will send to the Clerk's desk to have read from the Congressional Globe:

Well, then, as to New Mexico there can be no more people there. The man is ignorant, stupid who has looked at the map of New Mexico and read the accounts of it, who supposes there can be any more people there than there is now—some sixty or seventy thousand. It is an old-settled country, the people living along in the bottom of this valley on the two sides of a little stream, a garter of land only on one side and the other, filled by coarse landholders and miserable peons. It can sustain, not only under this cultivation but under any cultivation that our American race should ever submit to, no more people than there are there now. There will then be two Senators for 60,000 inhabitants in New Mexico to the end of our lives and to the end of the lives of our children.

* * * * * * *

Now, of New Mexico. Of that, forty-nine-fiftieths at least is a mere barren waste of desert, plain, or mountain. There is no wood, no timber, little faggots to light a fire carried thirty or forty miles on mules. There is no natural fall of rains as in temperate climates. The place and scene are Asiatic: enormously high mountains running up, some to the height of 10,000 feet, with very narrow valleys at their bases, through which streams trickle along; a garter winds along, through the thread of which runs the Rio Grande from afar in the Rocky Mountains, down to the latitude of about 33°, some three or four hundred miles. There these 60,000 persons are. In the mountains on the right and left are streams whose natural tendencies would be as lateral streams to flow into the Rio Grande, and in certain seasons of the year when the rains have been abundant in the mountains some of them do actually reach the Rio Grande, but the greater part of the year never reach an outlet to the sea. They are absorbed in the sandy and desert plains of the country. There is no culture anywhere save that which can be obtained by artificial watering or irrigation. You can have this along the narrow valley of the Rio Grande, in the gorges of the mountains, where the streams are, but you cannot have it down along the course of those streams that lose themselves in the sands.

Now, sir, there is no public domain in New Mexico. There is not a foot of land to be sold by the Government. There is not an acre that will become ours when the country becomes ours, not an acre. But, more than this, the country is full of people, such as they are. There is not the least thing in it to invite the settlement of our planters or farmers. There will go, I dare say, speculators, traders—some of them adventurers tired of the good country in the valley of the Mississippi who desire to wander; but I undertake to say that there will not be two hundred farmers or planters from the United States in New Mexico in the next fifty years. They cannot live there. Do you suppose they are going to cultivate lands which cannot be made productive in the slightest degree without irrigation? The people that are there produce little and live upon little. I believe the characteristic of our farmers throughout this country is to produce a good deal and consume a good deal. Again, New Mexico is not like Texas. I had hoped and still hope that Texas is to be filled up with a population like ourselves; not by the Spanish race, not by peons, not by coarse, ignorant, vulgar landlords with tribes of slaves around them, predial and otherwise.

* * * * * * *

New Mexico is secluded, isolated, a place by itself, in the middle of the mountains, five hundred miles from Texas.

Mr. RUSK. Five hundred miles from the settled portions of Texas.

Mr. WEBSTER. Further from anywhere else! It does not belong anywhere. It has no belongings about it. Sir, at this moment it is absolutely more retired and shut out from communication with the civilized world than the Sandwich Islands or most of the islands in the Pacific Ocean. It presses hard on Typee, and the people are infinitely less elevated in mind and condition than the people of the Sandwich Islands; far less worthy of our association, far less fit to send their Senators here than are the inhabitants of the Sandwich Islands; far less worthy are they than the better class of Indians in our neighborhood. Commend me to the Cherokees, the Choctaws, if you please to speak of the Pawnees, the Blackfeet and the Snake Indians and the Flatheads—anything except the —— Indians, and I am satisfied with them, instead of the people of New Mexico. They have no notions of our institutions or of any free institutions. Have they any notion of popular government? Why, not the slightest; not the slightest on earth. And the question is asked, What will be their constitution? It is farcical to talk of such a people making a constitution. They do not know the meaning of the term. They do not know its import. They know nothing at all about it. And I can tell you, sir, that when we have made it a Territory and wish to make it a State, such a constitution as the executive power of this Government thinks fit to send to them will be sent and adopted. The constitution of our fellow-citizens of New Mexico will be framed in the city of Washington. Now, what says Colonel Hardin in regard to New Mexico, that most lamented and distinguished officer, whom I well knew as a member of the other House, and whose death I did most deeply deplore? He gives a description of New Mexico, and speaks of the people of that country in these terms:

"The people are on a par with their land. One in two hundred or five hundred is rich, and lives like a nabob, the rest are peons, or servants sold for debt, who work for their masters and are as subservient as the slaves of the South, and look like Indians; and, indeed, are not more capable of self-government. One man, Jacobus Sanchez, owns three-fourths of all the land our column has passed over in Mexico. We are told we have seen the best part of Northern Mexico; if so, the whole of it is not worth much."

I need not read the whole extract. He speaks of all Northern Mexico, and New Mexico is not the better of it. Sir, there is a recent traveler, who is not unfriendly to the United States if I may judge from his works, for he commends us everywhere. He is an Englishman, and his name is Ruxton. I believe his work is in the library, and I suppose that gentlemen have seen it. He gives an account of the morals and manners of these people; and, Mr. President and Senators, I will take leave to introduce you to these, your soon to be respected fellow-citizens of New Mexico:

"It is remarkable that, although existing from the earliest times of the colonization of New Mexico, a period of two centuries, in a state of continual hostility with the numerous savage tribes of Indians who surrounded their Territory, and in constant insecurity of life and property from their attacks, being also far removed from the enervating influences of large cities, and in their isolated situation entirely dependent on their own resources, the inhabitants are totally destitute of those qualities which, for the above reasons, we might naturally have expected to distinguish them, and are as deficient in energy of character and physical courage as they are in all the moral and intellectual qualities. In their social state, but one degree removed from the veriest savages, they might take lessons even from these in morality and the conventional decencies of life. Imposing no restraint on their passions, a shameless and universal concubinage exists, and a total disregard of moral law to which it would be impossible to find a parallel in any country calling itself civilized; a want of honorable principle and consummate duplicity and treachery characterize all their dealings. Liars by nature, they are treacherous and faithless to their friends, cowardly and cringing to their enemies; cruel, as all cowards are, they unite savage ferocity with their want of animal courage; as an example of which their recent massacre of Governor Bent and other Americans may be given, one of a hundred instances."

"One out of a hundred instances," and these are soon to be our beloved countrymen!

Mr. President, for a good many years I have struggled to oppose everything that I thought tended to strengthen the arm of Executive power. I think it is growing more and more formidable every day, and I think that yielding to it in this as in other instances will give it strength which it may be hereafter very difficult to resist. I think I see a course adopted that is likely to turn the Constitution under which we live into a deformed monster, into a curse rather than a blessing; into a great frame of unequal government not founded on popular representation, but founded on the grossest inequalities, and I think if it go on—for there is danger that it will go on—that this Government will be broken up. I resist it to-day and always—whoever falls I resist—although I see that all the portents are discouraging. Would to God I could auspicate good influences! Would to God that those who think with me on this subject had stronger support! Would that we could stand where we would desire to stand! But with few, or alone, my position is fixed. If there were time I would gladly awaken the country. I believe the country will be awakened, it may be too late; but, supported or unsupported, by the blessing of God, I shall do my duty. I see well enough all the sinister indications, but I am supported by a deep and conscientious sense of duty, and while supported by that feeling of duty and while such great interests are at stake, I shall defy all augury and ask no omen but my country's cause.

Such were the words of Daniel Webster but little more than a quarter of a century ago, and terrible as was his accusation, it passed unchallenged. But, Mr. Chairman, the present status of New Mexico is the question with which we have now to deal. And first as to its population. Of the 91,874 persons inhabiting this Territory in 1870, 86,254 were natives of the Territory—Spaniards or Mexicans—and only 5,620 foreigners, and of this latter number 3,913 were born in Mexico; thus actually leaving in this Territory a population, exclusive of Mexicans, greasers, and Indians, of less than two thousand persons. The number of families in the Territory was only 21,449, and the number of dwellings 21,053.

But this is not all. Of the entire population of the Territory there were 48,836 persons above the age of ten years who were unable to read, and 52,220 who were unable to write. The census of that year showed that only 29,361 persons were engaged in any permanent employment; and of this number only 18,688 were engaged in agricultural pursuits, of whom 10,847 were laborers, and only 7,629 farmers and planters. Without going further into details I will add that, according to the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for 1874, the number of tribal Indians in the Territory was 25,268, which, of course, are not included in the census above given.

But here, Mr. Chairman, let us ascertain what proportion of this vast area of 121,201 square miles is in actual cultivation. In 1870 the number of acres of improved land in farms was 143,007; the number of farms 4,480, of which latter number 1,345 contained each less than ten acres. The productions of the Territory for the year 1870 were 352,822 bushels of wheat, 42 bushels of rye, 640,823 bushels of Indian corn, 67,660 bushels of oats, 3,876 bushels of barley, &c. And of this vast area 10,000 square miles is a large estimate for the land that is or can be made productive. Every acre must be irrigated. The only land fitted for cultivation is located in the valleys by the streams, nearly all of which is occupied by Mexicans. It is possible, sir, that New Mexico may, under the most favorable circumstances, by the year 1900, contain a population of 150,000; and it will then contain all of the population of a permanent character that it can possibly sustain. I would not underrate its mining interests, but we have the history of Nevada as a proof that rich mines do not add largely to the permanent population of a State. In the year 1870 the total valuation of the real estate of the Territory was only $9,917,991; of the personal property, $7,866,023; total valuation of real and personal property only $17,784,014.

Now, sir, as this bill seeks to transform this Territory into a State, and as intelligence is the very corner-stone and life of popular government, let us inquire what are the facilities within the limits of New Mexico for the education of its youth. The statistics for the year 1873 show that the total number of schools in the Territory during that year, including public, private, and Pueblo schools, was only 164; the total number of pupils in attendance upon all of these schools

7,102; and the entire corps of teachers only 196. And, sir, of the entire number of public schools in the Territory only 10 were taught in English, while 111 were taught in the Spanish language.

Mr. Chairman, it may be well to inquire what advancement has been made by other portions of this continent while New Mexico has thus slumbered for two centuries undisturbed by the wheels of progress? The State which I have the honor in part to represent, with an area less than one-half of that of New Mexico, is now the fourth in population. At the time of its territorial organization its total population was but 12,282 persons, and now, after a lapse of but little more than half a century, it contains within its limits a population of near three million souls; and during the decade of years immediately preceding the taking of the last Federal census, the increase in population was a little more than 48 per cent. As shown by the census of 1870, it contained more acres of improved land and produced more oats, Indian corn, and wheat than any of its sister States. It contained 10,329,952 acres of improved land and 202,803 cultivated farms. In 1850, when New Mexico received its present territorial government, Illinois contained but one hundred and eleven miles of railroad, while to-day it contains more than any other State of this Union. In 1840 the total valuation of its property, real and personal, was but $58,752,168, while one-third of a century later it had reached the enormous sum of $1,341,361,842.

Such, Mr. Chairman, are some of the evidences of its material wealth and prosperity. But in the higher realms of intellectual advancement is to be found the true wealth of a State. In addition to its colleges and universities, Illinois in 1870 gave employment to 24,056 teachers, and its 11,835 public and private schools were attended by 767,775 pupils. Sir, I disclaim any intention of making an invidious comparison between the State of Illinois and the Territory of New Mexico. But fidelity to the people who have sent me to this Hall demands that the facts of history should be made known, and a solemn protest entered against any legislation that will give to New Mexico, with its 90,000 inhabitants, an equal representation in the higher branch of our National Legislature with the 3,000,000 of people of my own State.

But if it be unjust to test the progress and attainments of New Mexico by that of the great State of Illinois, let the comparison be made with a single one of the five counties constituting the district which I have the honor to represent upon this floor.

The county of McLean, with an area of 1,132 square miles, contains a population of more than sixty thousand inhabitants. It produced in the year 1870 212,756 bushels of wheat, 39,824 bushels of rye, 911,127 bushels of oats, 36,072 bushels of barley, and 3,723,379 bushels of Indian corn. In the year 1875 the number of free schools in the county was 254, in addition to its colleges and universities, while the pupils in attendance upon all of its institutions of learning aggregated more than fifteen thousand.

This, sir, is the population, the material wealth, and these the products and the facilities for education of one county—a single one of the one hundred counties—constituting the State of Illinois. And yet this bill proposes to constitute New Mexico, with one-half of the number of public schools and less than one-twentieth of the population, exclusive of Indians and Mexicans, of this single county—A STATE.

Mr. Chairman, the facts I have given, compiled from official sources, need no comment; and if it be true that the education of the people is necessary in order to a proper exercise of the high prerogatives of citizenship, then how startling the fact that within the Territory of New Mexico—more than double in area that of New England—there are only one hundred and sixty-four schools, of which number one hundred and eleven are taught in the Spanish language.

Mr. Chairman, I have said that New Mexico has a history of two hundred and sixty-one years, extending further back than the time of the first settlement at Jamestown, Virginia, or the landing of the pilgrims at Plymouth Rock. It had been taken possession of by the Spaniards and christened with its present name more than a century and a half before Daniel Boone entered the forests of Kentucky, or the daring George Rogers Clarke penetrated the wilds of Illinois to the banks of the Mississippi and planted the American flag over the French villages. Can any friend of this bill explain to this House why it is that during the two centuries and a half that have passed since New Mexico first had a history it has thus lagged behind in the great march of civilization while all other portions of the North American continent have made such gigantic strides in material wealth and greatness? Sir, if this bill passes this House, then so long as this Republic may endure, New Mexico, with its handful of population, of less than one inhabitant to each square mile of territory, is to have a representation in one branch of our national Congress equal to that of the most populous State of this Union.

It is true, sir, that the provision granting to the States of the Union equal representation in the Senate is one of the compromises of the Constitution. The justice and propriety of its incorporation were doubted by many of the framers of that instrument. The main purpose of its adoption was to remove the jealousy and distrust felt by the smaller toward the larger States by giving them equal power in the Senate, and thus at a critical moment in our history to induce them to become integral parts of the new Federal Government. Thus Delaware and Rhode Island were given the same representation in the less popular branch of Congress with Massachusetts and Virginia. And yet, accustomed as we are to the fact, it nevertheless seems an anomaly in representative government that, while Delaware, Illinois, and New York have each two Senators upon the floor of the other Hall of this Capitol, yet here in the popular branch of the American Congress Illinois has a representation nineteen and New York thirty-three times as great as that of the State of Delaware. Of this, sir, I make no complaint. It is one of the compromises of the Constitution, entered into in a spirit of conciliation and wisdom by the framers of that instrument, and palsied be the arm that would strike it from our Federal compact. But while this is true, in the name of the great State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor, I enter my solemn protest against the passage of a bill which will give to New Mexico, with its 90,000 inhabitants, including Mexicans and greasers, an equal representation in the Senate of the United States with the 3,000,000 people of the State of Illinois.

Mr. Chairman, it will be urged by the advocates of this bill that by the admission of Nevada and other Territories Congress has established a precedent under which New Mexico should be admitted. Taking Nevada for an illustration I concede that the precedent has been established. The question with us is, shall it be followed? Is it the part of statesmanship to follow a vicious precedent in legislation or to discard it? Sir, of all the dangerous uses of legislative power ever exercised by Congress in order to subserve mere partisan purposes I know of none that will stand less chance of justification in history than that of the dominant party in the admission of Nevada as a State of this Union.

The Federal census for 1870 shows the population of the State of Nevada, exclusive of tribal Indians, to be only 42,491 persons, and of this number thirty-one hundred and fifty-two were Chinese. What party exigency or necessity could justify the act by which this handful of people were granted the prerogatives and powers of a State? A population less than one-third of that of the district which I represent, and but little more than one-half of that of the county in which I reside. And yet these 42,491 persons, Chinese included, have a representation in the other wing of this Capitol equal to that of Pennsylvania or New York.

Mr. Chairman, the legislation by which Nevada became a State is as immutable as the laws of the Medes and Persians. Its rights as such cannot now be challenged. We have no disposition, no power to undo what has been done, but we have the power to prevent a repetition. Where, sir, can be the necessity or the justice of transforming into a State any Territory with a population less than that necessary to give a State an additional Representative upon this floor? The ratio of representation in the lower House of Congress by the apportionment made under the Federal census of 1870 is one Representative for every 137,000 inhabitants. But under this bill New Mexico, with a population of forty-seven thousand less than that represented by each member upon this floor, is to have in the Senate of the United States equal representation, equal voice, and equal power with the three millions of people of Illinois or the five millions of the State of New York. Whatever course has been pursued in the past, I am confident that the time has now come when it should be the established policy of this Government to admit to this Union no Territory with a population less than the prescribed ratio of representation for the States.

Mr. Chairman, if this bill becomes a law, and the precedent thus established be followed in the future, what must be the inevitable result? If ninety thousand persons, with only forty-four hundred and eighty farms; with a taxable property, real and personal, aggregating only $17,784,014; with only ten public schools taught in our own language for the education of the youth—if these shall constitute a STATE, who can tell, what imagination can conceive what will be the number and what the character of the States of our Federal Union when another half century shall have been added to our history? The seat of empire will not only have been transferred from our eastern seaboard far beyond the valley of the Mississippi, but in one branch of our national Legislature the numerical power will abide in the innumerable States yet to be carved out of our vast western domain. If this bill becomes a law it gives strength to a dangerous precedent, one that may return often to torment its inventors.

Mr. Chairman, when this bill, or one similar in its provisions, was discussed in the last Congress, it was strenuously insisted that New Mexico had a right under the Guadalupe Hidalgo treaty to demand admission into the Union, and that it would be a violation of plighted faith upon the part of the United States to refuse her such admission. If such were the fact I would prefer that this bill should pass, rather than that the Government should be guilty of violating the letter or spirit of its treaty. I do not underrate the importance of a sacred observance of our national faith. But, sir, to defeat this bill and postpone her admission until she possesses all of the necessary requirements will not be an act of bad faith toward New Mexico. There is not in that treaty a line or syllable which, by any reasonable construction, militates against the right of Congress to decide as to the time when or the conditions upon which New Mexico should be admitted as a State. To have yielded this right by treaty or stipulation would have been an act of folly hardly equaled in our political history.

Necessarily, the power to decide when any Territory shall be admitted and the conditions of its admission must rest in Congress as the representative of the Government. To deny this right would deprive Congress of one of its highest and most essential attributes. And I insist, sir, that there is nothing in the treaty to which I have referred that can prevent Congress from exercising the same discretion, the same right of judging as to the qualifications of New Mexico for admission that would be exercised upon the application of any other Territory. Certainly it could never have been intended that Congress should by any treaty or stipulation divest itself of the important prerogative of deciding what qualifications, what attainments, were necessary in order to entitle New Mexico to become an independent State.

I insist, then, sir, that the action of Congress upon this question has not been forestalled. New Mexico, as an applicant for admission into this Union, must rest her claim upon a more tenable foundation than that of a vested right under the treaty with our Government. Her claim and only claim for admission must rest upon her advancement, material prosperity, and the number of her people and their capacity for self-government. If these be wanting, there can be no doubt as to what should be the decision of this House. From an examination of these questions I am fully persuaded, Mr. Chairman, that the time has not yet come when New Mexico is entitled to the position of a sovereign independent State of this Union.

Let it be the settled, the undeviating policy of our Government to admit no State to this Republic until it possesses the requisite population and material prosperity to entitle it to such pre-eminence; nay more, until the education, the intelligence of the people fit them for the proper exercise of sovereign power.

In the light of the facts I have mentioned, is it meet and proper, Mr. Chairman, that New Mexico should be accorded the high honor of being known in history as the centennial State of the great American Republic?

Mr. Chairman, during the few moments of time yet allotted me, I desire to refer briefly to another subject. The period through which we are now passing will be known as that of corruption and maladministration in Government; of peculation and venality in all of the avenues of official service, avenues leading too often, alas, to the high places of power. The demand is now more imperative than ever before for reform; reform in all Departments of the service; economy in all of the expenditures of the Government. Such is the stringency in our finances to-day, that all, in palace and in hovel alike, are compelled by inexorable necessity to reduce the ordinary expenses of living. The same rule of retrenchment thus demanded in private life must be applied with an unrelenting hand to all who occupy positions of official station or power. Let it be said to the credit of the lower House of the present Congress that it did not swerve from the path of imperative duty, but that while reducing the salaries and compensation of others the sum of near $200,000 per annum was saved to the people by the reduction of the salaries of Senators and Representatives.

But more important still is the fact that the appropriation bills that have thus far passed this House, with the estimates of the Committee on Appropriations of the bills yet to be reported, show a saving in the aggregate to the Treasury for the coming fiscal year of over $30,000,000 as compared with the appropriations for the same purposes made by the last Congress.

Sir, the work of retrenchment has not begun too soon. While private expenses are being curtailed, and economy almost unparalleled is being practiced by the people, why should not the same rule be applied to governmental expenditures? It is only by cutting off expenses wherever it can be done without detriment to the proper administration of the Government, here reducing a salary and there abolishing an unnecessary office, that the sum of $30,000,000 per annum can be saved to our National Treasury. Is there not food for reflection in the fact that during the last eleven years the aggregate Federal taxation exceeds the enormous sum of $4,500,000,000, an amount double that of our national debt? And yet how striking the disproportion between the amount received into our Treasury and that actually applied toward the extinction of our national debt.

I repeat, sir, that national economy is now a paramount necessity. This Government cannot permanently endure unless a check be placed upon the reckless extravagance and consequent demoralization that have been a part of its history during the last decade of years. Mr. Chairman, in view of these facts the importance of the legislation to which I have referred, reducing the governmental expenditures, cannot be overestimated. With it as a starting point, I trust that we may as a people soon emerge from the shadows which have darkened our national horizon by an era of official corruption, extravagance, and venality heretofore unknown in the history of any people.

Mr. Chairman, with the industries of the country paralyzed, with capital idle and labor seeking employment, with the constant recurrence of financial disaster in the marts of business, with an entire people groaning under the burden of debt and taxation, and thousands reduced to beggary, there is in all portions of this land an undefined feeling of dread as to the future. For these evils there must be a cause. I cannot but believe that the act passed in the closing hours of the last Congress providing for a forced return to specie payments on the 1st day of January, 1879, is in a large degree responsible for the financial disaster which has now overtaken us. That measure was enacted, as it was then declared, in order that the republican party might have a "policy" upon the question of finance. It gave them a policy, but at the expense of untold disaster to the country.

Sir, whatever may be the legislation upon this question hereafter, and I know the problem is one difficult of solution, I am confident that, if we would avoid still further prostration of business and still greater evils, the Sherman resumption law should now be repealed. Such are my firm convictions, and I have from the beginning of my service in this House given my support to every measure looking to its repeal.

Mr. Chairman, the thousands and tens of thousands of petitions sent to this Congress praying for the repeal of this act attest in unmistakable language the deep convictions of the people as to the evils it has brought upon them. And whatever political party arrays itself in opposition to the repeal of this law and the relief of the people, will be ground to powder in the coming struggle for political supremacy.

OUR INDUSTRIES, AS THEY RELATE TO FINANCE.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, the question which should, above all others, in my humble judgment, engage the earnest attention of this Congress, is that of the universal suffering and distress which pervade the country. Our entire business system, sir, seems to be struggling in the throes of dissolution. Upon the countenances of men everywhere, and in every condition of life, may be seen settled expressions of gloom and despair, indicating too plainly to be misinterpreted not only their present suffering, but the painful apprehension with which they regard the future. Three years ago a stringency (as financiers term it) came creeping over the land, producing sudden suspension of business, and culminating finally in just such a financial panic as was never before known in the history of American institutions. And while it is true, sir, that the great convulsion itself has measurably subsided, it has left the forces that generated it still in existence, actively operating and threatening to overwhelm the people with still greater prostration of their commercial and industrial interests. To-day, sir, every industry and every branch of trade in the land is paralyzed to a greater or less degree. Our furnaces are cold, our factories still, our ships idle, our vast beds of iron and coal resting undisturbed by the hand of labor, our grain in the West wasting upon the hands of the farmer, and our cotton plantations bankrupting their owners for the want of remunerative prices for their great staple.

Thus we find our country, with resources greater in extent and richer in variety and value than those of any other portion of the habitable globe, with millions of its population to-day without employment, and, as a consequence thereof, in want of food and clothing. Let me ask, Mr. Chairman, is there no cure for these widespread ills? Are not the patriotism and wisdom of our statesmanship equal to the task of arresting them for the present and of preventing them for the future? These questions are being asked by the constituents of every Representative on this floor, and those who ask them demand and are justly entitled to an answer. Will we give it? And, if so, it well becomes us to inquire the cause at once, seek out the remedy, and apply it with all possible diligence.

No one, I think, will for a moment deny that the principal cause is the prostration of

OUR PRODUCTIVE INDUSTRIES.

The best standard of estimating the extent and nature of the decline in these various industries is the amount and value of our foreign exports. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his last annual report to Congress, tells us that the exports of our domestic products alone have decreased in value for the last fiscal year to the extent of $70,149,321. Now, let us examine and see in what this deficit consists. The Secretary says there was a decrease in value of the following articles, to wit:

Agricultural implements, $464,381; hogs, $886,622; bacon and hams, $4,771,295; Indian corn, $313,024; wheat, $41,813,596; Indian-corn meal, $238,866; rye, $1,363,792; railroad-cars, $641,037; coal, $1,183,211; raw cotton, $20,584,955; hemp, and manufactures of hemp, $243,898; oils, $10,530,594; spirits of turpentine, $834,389; tallow, $2,443,117; tobacco, $5,157,632; sailing-vessels, $617,528; staves and timbers, $3,281,388; wool and other manufactures, $322,256.

This decrease in the exports of domestic products, when added to the increased export of coin, amounts in the aggregate to the enormous sum of $121,193,298.

And this vast sum was lost to the industries of our country in one year. Now, it behooves us to ascertain, if it be possible, the true cause of this alarming decrease in the value of the exports of our domestic products. It has been attributed by some to overproduction. In other words, that the world is producing more than it consumes, and that, consequently, these products are worthless, and wasting on the hands of the producers. I propose to show, Mr. Chairman, that it is not true that overproduction has, in any way, contributed to our present troubles. To ascribe them to overproduction is, in effect, to say that industry and enterprise have made us poor. How can gentlemen make such an assertion, when statistics show that in the last twenty years we have imported over $1,000,000,000 in excess of what we were able to pay by sale of exports?

In the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the year 1873, I find the following language:

> The balance of trade in merchandise has been largely against the United States for many years, and the country has exported during the twenty years, ending with the last fiscal year, gold and silver to the extent of more than a thousand millions of dollars over and above the amount imported.

Thus it is most conclusively shown that overimportation and underproduction are the real causes.

But, again, it is equally evident, as you will perceive from the following exhibit, that consumption is and has been steadily increasing throughout the world.

In the year 1859 the exports of domestic products from France amounted in value to $253,292,400, and in 1873 they were $718,716,800. In 1865 the total exports of Austria were $170,340,670, and in 1872 $191,090,630. In 1864 Belgium exported to Great Britain $20,871,105, and in 1872 her total exports were $210,226,000. In 1864 Denmark exported to Great Britain $11,211,500, in 1873 $17,855,695; and this was principally wheat. In 1864 Germany exported to England $73,981,675, and in 1873 $99,632,255; and the largest item of these exports was wheat. In 1863 Russia exported $111,665,000, and in 1872 $246,645,265. In 1864 England exported $902,245,000, and in 1873 $1,275,823,015.

Thus I find, Mr. Chairman, in all of those countries a steady increase in the value of their exports, amounting to nearly 100 per cent. On turning to the value of the exports of our own country, I find that in 1869 the United States exported $439,134,529, and in 1875 $499,284,100; an increase of less than 7 per cent. This exhibit shows conclusively that the demand, so far from diminishing, is greatly on the increase, and that from some cause we have not supplied this demand in the ratio of other countries. Again, I find that France in fourteen years increased her annual exports from $253,292,400 to $718,716,800, and yet the total value of her annual industrial products is only $1,900,000,000, while that of the United States is $4,232,325,000. Since 1860, a period of fifteen years, we have quadrupled our products, and yet the increased value of our exports has been but a little more than $100,000,000. I also find, Mr. Chairman, that the population of the world steadily increases; and, of course, this increase of population necessarily creates a corresponding increase in the demand for food and clothing. And still, in the face of this fact, the Secretary of the Treasury tells us that the export of wheat alone from this country has fallen off $41,000,000 during the last fiscal year, and that of raw cotton $20,000,000. In the year 1860, and for many years prior thereto, we enjoyed almost an entire monopoly of the in the markets of the world. Since then, the consumption of cotton has nearly doubled, and yet our exportation of that article has declined almost one-half. Now, what is the cause of this? If we examine the foreign-trade statistics, we find that the export of cotton from India, Brazil, and Egypt has increased nearly 300 per cent., and that this increase is steadily driving American cotton out of the foreign markets. Only a few years ago, we held an equal control of the grain markets.

THE WHEAT, CORN, AND PROVISIONS OF THE WEST

found ready sale in almost every kingdom of Europe. We then enjoyed at home a degree of independence and prosperity which, while it even astonished ourselves, made us the envy of every other nation of the earth. It was our proud boast that America could feed the world and that our "cotton was king." Content with this feeling of self-sufficiency, we did nothing to assure the commercial supremacy which we then held. Accepting the fallacy that railroads had superseded all other means of transportation, without proper investigation we suffered our internal navigation to fall largely into disuse. Our rivers being neglected and suffered to remain or to become obstructed, the whole carrying business passed into the hands of railroad monopolies and foreign ship-owners. Although the tide of immigration still flowed to us, yet just then our prosperity began to decline. While we were thus neglecting our domestic productions, and failing to secure for them the natural and cheaper means of transportation, let us see what was the policy pursued by other countries. Take England, for example. Her India provinces were well adapted to the growth of cotton. Efforts to produce it had proved successful, but the great difficulty in the way of utilizing it in the manufacture of her fabrics was the cost of transportation from the interior to the seaboard. This item of expense was so great as to prevent competition with our cotton. We in America ridiculed the idea that a staple so inferior in quality and so high in price could ever supersede the superior and cheaper staple of our more favored land. So well satisfied were we with our great advantages in supplying the markets of the world with this great staple, that, like the hare in the fable, we went to sleep, and left the race uncontested, while the tortoise (England) moved steadily along. Conscious of her great advantage in her low rate of interest on loanable capital, she saw the importance of improving the quality and reducing the cost of producing India cotton. She at once inaugurated an enlightened and liberal system for the improvement of her internal navigation. To carry out her policy of encouraging the production of cotton in India for the supply of her factories at home, she guaranteed the interest on an expenditure of over $400,000,000 for the improvement of internal transportation in those distant colonies.

Now, let us see the result of her policy as exhibited by the receipts of cotton in Great Britain in 1860 compared with 1872:

COTTON.

From—	1860.	1872.
	Pounds.	Pounds.
United States	1,115,890,608	625,000,080
All other countries	275,480,144	783,237,392

Our exports of raw cotton have fallen off, as previously stated, nearly 50 per cent., while other countries have gained nearly 300 per cent.

So complete has been England's success in this direction that to-day India sells more cotton in the European markets than we do. She is sparing no pains and no outlay of money to make herself mistress of the cotton market, and she is gradually accomplishing her purpose. In view of what she has already done, I here put upon record the assertion, Mr. Chairman, that, unless we take immediate steps to re-instate our own product, the day is not remote when we will not only see our staple entirely driven out of European markets, but we will find England an active competitor in our home markets. Unless the present tendency to increase in the cost of producing cotton in this country can be checked and that cost lessened to a considerable extent, many who listen to me to-day will live to see raw cotton imported from India, Egypt, and Brazil, and sold in the cities of New York and Boston.

Why, sir, be not surprised when I tell you that this very thing is already begun. In 1874, 3,625,830 pounds of raw cotton were imported into the United States, some of it brought here from far-off China and the East Indies. And even this small beginning has robbed those who labor in the cotton-fields of the South of about $1,000,000, (it being of the long-staple variety of cotton and valued at about thirty cents per pound.)

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us look for a cure for this. Those who contend that overproduction is the cause of our financial prostration tell us that the remedy is to produce less. They advise the cotton-planter to reduce the production to one-half of the present amount and he will realize as much for it as he does for a full crop! Do such counselors stop to reflect that India, Egypt, and Brazil already export and sell nearly three times as much cotton as they did in 1860, while we export less than one-half of what we did then? Do they remember the significant fact that raw cotton has already been sold in our markets which was produced in foreign countries, and that Egyptian cotton has not only driven our hitherto famous sea-island cotton entirely out of the foreign markets, but threatens to destroy the production of that valuable staple upon the coast of Georgia and South Carolina?

Twenty years ago the sea islands of Georgia and South Carolina were mines of wealth to their owners. To-day they are to a large extent abandoned and gone to waste. Lands which at that time were held almost above price would now scarcely bring in the market $3 per acre. No, sir; the real cause of all this is that they produce cotton in India, Brazil, and Egypt, and elsewhere cheaper than we do, and hence are enabled to undersell us in the markets and take our profits away. Under this state of facts, the truth of which cannot be denied, we are obliged to accept one of two alternatives.

We must either abandon the production of cotton as an article of export or we must produce it at less cost. Let us consider the first proposition. Suppose we abandon the culture of cotton, what can we substitute in its place? Will you say corn and wheat? Why, we are told that corn is sometimes burned for fuel in the West; and we know that the export of wheat has fallen off the past year $41,000,000. If, then, we direct the labor of the country to the production of more corn and wheat, where will we find a market for its sale? And what then will be our means of procuring other needed supplies? And, beside this, we already have a striking example of what the abandonment of the culture of our cotton would result in. The growing of sea-island cotton on the coast of Georgia has been largely abandoned and nothing substituted in its place. As a consequence, ruin and desolation have fallen upon that section. No, sir, let me repeat, if we would regain our former prosperity, if we would re-instate our supremacy in the cotton market, we must produce cheaper than our competitors. And to do this we must avail ourselves of the same means which they have adopted.

Now, let us turn our attention for a moment to the almost boundless prairies of the West—the great granary of the world, as we once boasted it to be. Does any one deny that on these fertile plains, with a fair rate of interest on money and reasonable rates of transportation, all of the cereal crops can be produced and sold in the markets as cheap or even cheaper than any other portion of the globe? The man who doubts this would be laughed at as the veriest simpleton. Do we not know that the West, with all the disadvantages which at present depress her energies and enterprise, is still producing a vast surplus of supplies over and above what she is able to get to market? Official figures demonstrate that Illinois alone, with full development, is capable of producing surplus food sufficient to feed 10,000,000 of people. Then why do we not make and sell more of these products? Almost the whole of Europe, except Sweden, Norway, Denmark, and Russia, import breadstuffs. England alone buys annually two hundred and fifty-eight million six hundred and ninety-nine thousand and fifty-five dollars' worth of wheat and corn; and of this vast amount in 1873 the United States furnished less than one-fourth, or only about $64,000,000; and this fact is singularly striking and unfortunate when we at the same time consider that we buy more of England's products than any other country. Why is this? The answer is simply that other countries produce these breadstuffs and sell them to England cheaper than we do.

We once held the same monopoly of the grain trade that we did of the cotton trade. Then our corn, wheat, and cotton found ready sale, at remunerative prices, in almost every market, at home and abroad.

Every surplus bushel of grain and every pound of cotton was in such demand that the farmers and planters were encouraged to sow and to reap, for in so doing they were assured that "their labor would not be in vain." At this time, Russia and the United States were the great grain-producing countries of the world. Russia, owing to the superior fertility of her soil, cheapness of labor, and the lower rate of interest on capital, could grow wheat at less cost than the United States, but was unable to move it and place it in market as cheaply as we could. Hence her statesmanship and science were at once brought into requisition to remove this the only obstacle to her success. The Danube was at once opened to navigation, and thereby the cost of the internal transportation of her products was so cheapened as to render our competition with her in the grain markets of the world next to impossible.

To show the result of her policy in improving her inland navigation, I ask attention to the following table, which exhibits the imports of wheat from Russia and America into the United Kingdom from 1860 to 1864 compared with the imports from 1868 to 1872:

WHEAT.

From—	1860-'64.	1868-'72.
	Bushels.	Bushels.
Russia	47,376,809	117,967,022
United States	127,047,126	116,462,380

An increase during the latter period, as compared with the former, of 70,590,213 bushels from Russia, and a decrease of 10,584,746 from the United States. From these statistics I deduce the conclusion, and a few years of experience will vindicate its truth, that, unless we take similar steps to reduce the cost of producing and transporting our grain to market, the time is not remote when grain exported from the great central basin of Europe and Asia will enter into successful competition with that of the West in our Atlantic sea-ports.

We have glanced, Mr. Chairman, at two of the great industries of our country, the production of

and now let us notice as briefly as we can others which are of the highest relative importance. Let us next consider our

COTTON MANUFACTURES.

It is generally conceded that there is no portion of the world so well adapted by nature to the production of cotton as the Southeast Atlantic and Gulf States. The mildness of climate and the inexhaustible supply of first-class water-power, found in close proximity to the cotton-fields of that region, make this same cotton belt equally well adapted to the growth and manufacture of cotton into yarns and fabrics. But the cost of producing cotton, being greatly increased by the inefficiency of the present labor system, by the high rates of transportation, and the exorbitant interest paid upon the borrowed capital necessarily employed by the impoverished producers of that section, re-acts injuriously upon the manufacturer, and deprives both of the profits that legitimately belong to their business. Now, I would not be understood as saying that the regulation of the labor question is within the jurisdiction of Congress, for that is clearly a matter of private contract between the employer and the employé; but it is almost universally agreed that it is within the scope of legislative authority to make appropriations for the improvement of our rivers and harbors, and by so doing we will very greatly lessen the cost of transportation. As to the other difficulty—I mean the high rate of interest which the producer is compelled to pay upon money—while it may not be either constitutional or prudent to attempt to control it by congressional enactment, yet I think, and propose to show before I conclude my remarks, that this end may be reached in such way as to bring very great relief to labor, while at the same time the utmost freedom is allowed to capital. And, with these two difficulties removed, the results will contribute no little to the solution and adjustment of the first, the effect being to bring better wages to labor, better profits to the producer, and enable the manufacturer to supply the home demand for cotton goods and to compete successfully with other countries in the sale of his surplus. The cost of raw material, which is to a great extent determined by the cost of transportation, and the rate of interest on the moneyed capital employed in producing and bringing the surplus supplies of grain and meat from the West to the manufacturing districts of the East and the cotton plantations of the South, alike forbid our competing much longer either in the production or manufacture of cotton. We must not, Mr. Chairman, shut our eyes to the fact that it costs the farmers of the West six bushels of corn to send one bushel to the cotton-spinner of the East, and eight bushels to send one to the cotton producer of the South. Now can we for a moment imagine that our great productive industries will revive and prosper as long as that state of things exists? Disguise it as we may, here is to be found the chief causes of our present troubles, and we must apply the remedy. And that remedy is the same which other nations have successfully employed under precisely similar circumstances.

We hear a great deal said about the poor man's salt and the poor man's iron. There is sometimes much prating among politicians about the restrictions of commerce with foreign countries, and they occasionally display a little magnanimity in taking a few cents per pound off of these necessaries of life, but at the same time they do nothing to remove the enormous taxes of which I am speaking from the poor man's cotton and the poor man's corn. Many do not even seem to realize the fact that it is these onerous internal burdens that are robbing our labor of its just earnings and at the same time impoverishing the country. Here is the great source of our domestic distress and financial disturbance. This is why our mills are still, our ships idle, our fields uninviting, our moneyed capital unemployed, and, as a consequence, millions of our people suffering for the necessaries of life. The foreign demand for low-priced breadstuffs and cotton, both raw and manufactured, is constantly increasing.

Russia to-day has nine thousand or more textile factories, in which are employed between three and four hundred thousand operatives, and yet Russia imports annually from England more than three million dollars' worth of cotton goods. Austria consumes annually about forty-eight million dollars' worth of raw cotton. Of this amount the United States furnishes only $8,000,000, and other countries $40,000,000. And still Austria imports annually from Great Britain $2,275,360 worth of cotton fabrics. Almost every country in Europe imports, to a greater or less extent, the cotton goods of England, and we of the United States, with all our superior natural advantages, both for production and manufacture, import from abroad, and principally from England, about $30,000,000 of manufactured cotton goods annually. During the past year a small quantity of cotton goods, manufactured in the South, were exported to England and sold in that market as an experiment. Although a portion of these goods were sold at a loss, yet the fact was demonstrated that we could sell our goods even in that market at a profit, if we could reduce to a small extent the cost of manufacturing them. But, whether it be possible or not to sell our manufactured goods to any extent in foreign markets, it is certainly within our power to supply the home demand, and, by so doing, save to our own country $30,000,000 of gold annually, and thereby place our currency that much nearer a specie basis.

Some idea, Mr. Chairman, may be had of the value of cotton manufactures to England when we remember that she annually imports two hundred and seventy-two million five hundred and twenty-four thousand two hundred and thirty-five dollars' worth of raw cotton and exports three hundred and eighty-six million eight hundred and eighteen thousand and seventy-five dollars' worth of cotton fabrics; so that, after supplying her own wants, she makes a profit each year of $113,293,840 out of this single item alone. May not our country study her example to profit?

There is still another great industrial interest which claims our attention, the development of which is paralyzed by the same causes which, as we have seen, so seriously affect our grain, cotton, and manufactures. I mean the production of iron.

IRON.

I can forcibly illustrate the condition of this interest by my own section. There is, sir, a portion of Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee wonderfully rich in coal and iron ore. Vast beds of these minerals are found in close proximity to each other, extending over hundreds of square miles of territory. Actual experiment shows that iron can be produced here for $16 per ton, and, with better appliances than are now used, for $12 per ton. And yet iron that cost $22 per ton is actually driving the cheaper article, although equal if not superior in quality, out of the market. Now, why is this? The answer is simply because it costs $10.75 per ton to place the cheaper iron in market, while it only costs $1.80 per ton to get the higher-priced iron to market. These immense deposits of coal and iron of which I am speaking lie along the Tennessee and Coosa Rivers, whose channels are obstructed by shoals that can be easily removed. Both of these rivers are broad and deep above and below these shoals; and yet, sir, a few rocks are allowed to prevent their navigation, and thereby lock up millions of agricultural and mineral wealth. The development of these vast resources would give employment to thousands of our suffering people, and at the same time relieve the country of the necessity of sending abroad annually millions of gold, to purchase the very articles which nature has bestowed upon us in such rich profusion.

In my judgment, it is practicable, with judicious legislation upon the part of Congress, for Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee to manufacture and send iron to England and sell it for a profit. Indeed, sir, this very thing was actually done during the last year. Iron manufactured at the Cornwall furnace, in the State of Georgia, was shipped to England and sold at a profit, and that, too, in spite of the fact that it had to pay $10.75 per ton freight to reach the seaboard. Had the Coosa River been open to navigation, that shipment of iron would have been transported to the Atlantic at a cost of only $1.54 per ton freight, and the saving of this item of cost alone would have left a margin of profit sufficient to have converted an experiment into a well-established success. But, grant that we cannot compete with England in her home market, we certainly could supply our own wants and control the market on this continent. In the year 1873, England exported iron valued at $188,656,695, coal valued at $50,099,645, and cotton fabrics worth $386,818,075, making, in the aggregate, $627,574,415, or about $1,000,000 more than the entire exports of the United States for the same year. These immense exports of England found a ready market in every country on the American continent, including our nearest neighbor, Mexico. Between fifty and sixty millions came into the United States, in iron and its manufactures, and took from us that amount in gold, and that, too, while we are boasting of having iron and coal sufficient to supply the world for three thousand years, and that cotton is king and we control his empire.

I have shown, Mr. Chairman, the vast extent of our resources, the necessity for their development, the means by which it may be accomplished, and the benefits accruing therefrom to the country and the people. I now ask attention to the claims which our leading and most important industry has upon Congress as a matter of right and justice. I mean

OUR AGRICULTURE.

To illustrate its pre-eminence, I ask that you consider its extent, as exhibited by the following statistics, kindly furnished me by our able and efficient Commissioner of Agriculture, Hon. Frederick Watts:

Number of persons in all occupations in the United States	12,505,923
Number of persons engaged in agriculture, 47.35 per cent.	5,922,471
Number of persons engaged in professions, 21.47 per cent.	2,684,793
Number of persons engaged in trades and transportation, 9.52 per cent.	1,191,238
Number of persons engaged in manufactures and mining, 21.65 per cent.	2,707,421
Number of farmers	2,977,711
Number of farm laborers	2,888,966

AREA IN THE STATES.

Number of acres in farms	405,226,769
Number of acres not in farms	869,932,271
Total	1,275,189,040
Woodland in farms	158,867,227
Total area of woodland in States	380,639,763
Number of acres in farms, including Territories with States	407,793,364
Total not in farms in States and Territories	1,903,821,595

FARM VALUES IN 1870.

Value of farms in United States	$9,262,803,861
Value of farm implements	336,878,429
Value of farm animals	1,525,276,457
Total	11,124,958,747

This exhibit, Mr. Chairman, establishes the fact that this industry comprises, at the least calculation, one-half of our entire population, largely over one-third of our entire material wealth, and, it may be added, contributes 79 per cent. of the entire export values of the nation. Yet, notwithstanding the vast magnitude of its proportions and its superior claims upon the Government for encouragement, is it not true, sir, that it has been most shamefully overlooked and neglected in the past?

The immortal Washington, in his first annual address to Congress, used the following language:

> The advancement of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures by all proper means will not, I trust, need recommendation; but I cannot forbear intimating to you the expediency of giving effectual encouragement, as well to the introduction of new and useful inventions from abroad, as to the exertions of skill and genius in producing them at home.

And he adds:

> Nor am I less persuaded that you will agree with me in opinion that there is nothing which can better deserve your patronage than the promotion of science and literature. Knowledge is, in every country, the surest basis of public happiness.

The answer of the House, draughted by Mr. Madison, and adopted unanimously without alteration, fully indorses these sentiments. It said:

> We concur with you in the sentiment that agriculture, commerce, and manufactures are entitled to legislative protection.

Such, sir, were the wise and liberal sentiments of Washington, Madison, and their patriotic compeers respecting the promotion by Congress of these great sources of national prosperity and happiness. In these days of political degeneracy, and of departure from the well-defined landmarks of constitutional government, it is well to pause in our mad career of apostacy, and recur to the teachings of the founders of our political system. How striking the contrast presented in the earnest recommendation to Congress of these great interests by the father of the Republic, and the indifference and neglect with which they are treated by the legislators of the present day. While I am glad to admit that we have bestowed some care and attention upon our commerce and manufactures, what, I ask, has the Government done to foster and encourage this greatest of all our interests? The language of modern statesmanship is that "agriculture can take care of itself." Acting upon this mistaken and short-sighted policy, we are almost persuaded to withdraw even countenance and support from the only Department and representative it has in our national organization. If appropriations are asked commensurate with its demands and dignity, the application is ridiculed and denounced as the sheerest extravagance. Forgetting that this great interest supplies three-fourths of the revenues of the Government, and the entire food and clothing of the nation, furnishing all with an unselfish hand, there are to be found some among us who are inclined to withhold the appropriation of even a small sum of money for the distribution of improved varieties of seed and to publish the annual reports of the Agricultural Department; even though, by so doing, they deprive the farmers of the country of the information which they both need and desire, the dissemination of which would contribute very largely to the development and improvement of all of our industrial interests.

As a Representative in the American Congress, I should rejoice to see the farmers of this country fully aroused to an appreciation of the superior claims which they have as a matter of right and justice upon this Government. And here I am free to say that, if our present financial condition were such as to authorize it, I should be ready to urge this Congress to so enlarge our Agricultural Bureau as to make it one of the Departments proper. Yes, sir; I would group together the leading industries of the country—agriculture, commerce, manufactures, mines and mining—and organize them into a department, with cabinet representation, and thus establish the grandest, most important, and beneficent branch of the Federal Government. The truth is, we have done so little for the protection and development of our agricultural industries, that we to-day find that two of its leading products, to wit, cotton and grain, which we never thought could find rivals anywhere, are not only being driven out of the foreign market, but are destined in a few years, if our present policy continues, to find active competition even at home—India sending cotton and Russia grain to the United States. But a little while ago we were boasting that cotton was king, and America the corn-house of the world. To-day, for the want of an enlarged and conservative system for protecting and developing our industrial resources, we find the scepter which we once held in proud triumph rapidly departing from our hands.

I think that I have clearly shown, Mr. Chairman, that the loss to the agricultural interest during the past year was about $62,000,000, and this upon two articles alone, cotton and grain. Restore this $62,000,000, manufacture the $30,000,000 of cotton fabrics which we import, and supply the $50,000,000 that we send abroad for the purchase of iron, and it will add at once $142,000,000 of gold to our annual wealth. There is no good reason why this should not be done. It is only necessary for Congress to take proper steps to reduce the cost of transportation by the improvement of our inland navigation, and thus lessen the cost of production even to a small extent, and we will at once recover markets for the sale of all that we can produce or manufacture, and that, too, at remunerative prices.

In 1874 England imported $258,699,055 worth of grain, and only $64,494,240 of this amount, less than one-fourth, was furnished by the United States. A careful investigation of facts shows that could we have reduced the cost of our grain even fifteen cents per bushel, we might have sold to England, if not this entire amount, certainly a sufficient amount of grain and cotton to have placed the balance of trade in our favor, and by so doing contributed very largely to the removal of this great obstacle which is in the way of the resumption of specie payment.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I desire to remove from the minds of the producers of the country the fallacy which has been impressed upon them by the mere theoretical political economists of this day. They have been taught that they should buy their manufactured goods wherever they can be bought cheapest, and that this policy would build up a foreign market for their products, thereby giving them the advantage of low prices on what they need, and better prices upon what they sell. Now, let us subject this proposition to the crucial test of actual experience. So long as we produced cotton cheaper and better than any other country, we held a monopoly of the market in Great Britain; and so of grain. While the policy of England kept the Black Sea closed, we found a ready sale for all of our surplus grain at remunerative prices; but just as soon as it was opened to navigation, Russia stepped in as an active competitor, and very soon took from us more than half of this trade. India, Egypt, and Brazil entered the market also as competitors in the supply of raw cotton, and as a result our export of this product has fallen 50 per cent. since 1860. And while our farmers in the West thus lose the grain trade, and our planters of the South the cotton trade, England still sells to us her manufactured products largely in excess of what she buys from us; and, taking that balance in American gold, she goes with it into other markets and purchases her supplies of grain and cotton. And why? The answer is, simply because she buys from other producers cheaper than she can buy from us. We buy her manufactured goods cheaper than we can spin and weave them, and for the reason that we fail to follow the wise examples set us by France, Russia, and England, in removing from the producers every burden which retards their efforts to reduce the cost of production, and chief among them is the tax imposed in moving and getting their crops to market.

Let me illustrate this matter by the following striking truths, contained in a recent letter written by Hon. H. C. Carey to the London Times:

> In the year 1856 the domestic exports of France amounted to $340,000,000, having far more than trebled in twenty-five years; doing this, too, under a system that, as we now are told, must have destroyed the power to maintain any foreign commerce whatsoever. Of those exports, $140,000,000 consisted of textile fabrics weighing 20,000 tons, the equivalent of 100,000 bales of cotton, and sufficient, perhaps, to load some five-and-twenty of the ships that, as I think, were then in use. The charge for freight was, as may be readily seen, quite insignificant, and for the reason that the chief articles of value were skill and taste, $100,000,000 of which would not balance a single cotton-bale. Arrived out, the goods were all finished and ready for consumption, and, as a consequence of these great facts, there were no people retaining for themselves so large a proportion of the ultimate prices of their products as did those of France. At that date, two hundred and fifty years had elapsed since the first settlement of Virginia, and the whole country south of the Potomac, the Ohio, and the Missouri had been taken possession of by men of the English race, the total population having grown to almost a dozen millions. The territory so occupied contained, as I believe, more cultivable land, more coal, and more metallic ores than the whole of Europe, and it abounded in rivers calculated for facilitating the passage of labor and its products from point to point. What now had become, in 1856, the contribution of this wonderful territory, embracing a full half of the Union, to the commerce of the world? Let us see. The cotton exported amounted to 3,000,000 bales. To this may now be added 100,000 hogsheads of tobacco, the total money value of the exports of this vast territory having been almost precisely $140,000,000, barely sufficient to pay for the cargoes of five-and-twenty ships of a joint burden of 20,000 tons laden with the beautiful fabrics of France. For the carriage to market of this cotton and tobacco, how many ships were required? Thousands. How many seamen? Tens of thousands. Who paid them? The planters. Who paid the charges on the cotton until it reached its final consumer? The planter, whose share of the two, three, or five dollars a pound paid for his cotton by his customers in Brazil, Australia, or California amounted to but a single dime. It may, as I think, be safely asserted that of all the people claiming to rank as civilized there have been none who have retained for themselves so small a portion of the ultimate prices of their products as have those who have been accustomed to supply raw cotton to Britain and to France.

This same writer adds:

The first of all taxes is that of transportation, preceding as it does even the demands of the Government. Of this the Frenchman pays almost literally none, the commodities, taste, and skill, which mainly he exports, being classed among the imponderables. The planter, on the contrary, gives nine-tenths of the ultimate price of his products as his portion of this terrific tax, doing so for the reason that he is always exporting, in the forms of cotton and tobacco, the weighty food of men's labor, and the most valuable portions of the soil upon which that labor had been expended. Throughout the world, as here among ourselves, the exporters of raw produce pay all the taxes incident to a separation of consumers from producers, the manufacturing nation profiting by their collection. Hence it is, that while the former tend from year to year to become more dependent, the latter tend equally to become more independent. The protected Frenchman, freed from the most oppressive of all taxes, grows in love of the beautiful, in love of freedom, in that love of his native land by which he is everywhere distinguished. The unprotected men of the South, on the contrary, have been so heavily taxed on the road to their ultimate market as to have produced a constantly growing need for abandoning their exhausted lands. Since the date above referred to, both France and the South have passed through very destructive wars; but how widely different is their present condition: the one more prosperous than ever before, the other still in a condition of impoverishment—for the want of that policy and those advantages which have given new life and prosperity to the former.

There is still another and a very important view of the questions under discussion, which demand careful consideration, and that is the intimate relation which these several industries sustain to

THE FINANCIAL SYSTEM OF THE COUNTRY.

Money, whether it be gold, silver, or paper, is but the representative of value. Its use is to facilitate the exchange of commodities, and apart from the function which it thus discharges has but little or no intrinsic value. For reasons which it is not necessary to enumerate, gold was selected as the measure of values in effecting exchanges between different countries, and hence it became the money of nations. Now, it follows that, when one nation sells to other nations a great deal more of its products and manufactures than it buys from them, gold in that country must be to that extent abundant, and its presence there is the result of, and not the cause of, its commercial prosperity. On the other hand, when a nation buys a great deal more than it sells, this money of nations must be sent abroad to make up the deficit, and every one can see at a glance that, when this thing continues for many years, the gold must gradually decrease in such country until it finally disappears altogether. This has frequently been the case with different nations.

If we examine, Mr. Chairman, the statistics of trade from the formation of the Federal Government, we will find that two things are evident. The first is, that whenever gold was abundant here the balance of trade was in our favor. And the second is, that there was always a scarcity of gold whenever our imports exceeded our exports. From 1790 to 1820 the exportation of our domestic products amounted to $1,136,000,000, while the importation of foreign merchandise aggregated $1,667,000,000, leaving a balance against us in thirty years of $531,000,000, or an average of $17,700,000 per annum. Now, although this deficit was made up to a considerable extent by the coin brought into the country by immigrants, yet the deficiency became so great in our domestic circulation, that we were obliged to resort to a paper currency. And it was under the exigency thus precipitated that our system of State banks originated. And it is well to remind the hasty resumptionist of the present day that the basis on which this system rested proved in the end to be a ruinous financial fiction. The theory on which one dollar in coin was represented by three dollars in paper currency only survived so long as an influx of gold from immigrants and a fluctuating balance of trade enabled the banks to retain the stipulated specie deposit in their vaults.

From 1820 to 1837 we imported $1,309,000,000 of merchandise and $143,000,000 in specie, and we exported during this time $105,000,000 in specie and $1,105,000,000 in products. This balance against us gradually increased until the year 1837, when our imports exceeded our exports by $100,000,000. And it was then that one of our memorable national financial revulsions occurred. From 1837 to 1847 we imported $102,000,000 in specie and $976,000,000 in merchandise, and exported $90,000,000 in specie and $1,026,000,000 in products, leaving a small balance in our favor, and we were thereby enabled to recover to some extent from the previous disaster. From 1847 to 1853 we imported $1,083,000,000 of foreign merchandise and $32 000,000 in specie, and during the same period we exported $920,000,000 in products and $124,000,000 in specie. During this period the gold discoveries in California added largely to our home supply of gold, and hence this large exportation of gold abroad was not sensibly felt.

Since 1853 we have exported $1,214,000,000 of specie in excess of our imports. From that year up to 1857 the balance of trade was steadily against us, reaching in four years the large sum of $200,000,000, and sweeping from the banks their whole supply of specie. At this crisis most of our State banks were authorized by law to suspend. The country being drained of its specie, and the products of our mines exported as fast as coined to settle the balance of trade against us, even the fiction of the specie basis of previous years was necessarily abandoned. The Federal Government, under the exigencies of civil war, and having these repeated examples of failure and disaster growing out of attempts to maintain specie payments with the balance of trade so largely against us, adopted the present financial system, in which it substituted its faith and credit for gold as a basis.

Now, sir, let me inquire upon what does this faith and credit rest? Unquestionably upon the right of taxation. And what is the measure and value of this right? The answer is, the ability of the people to pay the tax imposed. Now let us see what constitutes that ability. Certainly the amount and value of their surplus products. And what determines the value of these surplus products? Common sense replies, first the cost of production, and secondly the ease and certainty with which they find a market. I have already shown, Mr. Chairman, that our cotton, grain, iron, coal, and manufactures, for all of which there is a constantly-increasing demand throughout the world, are sufficient, and more than sufficient, under proper development, after supplying our home demand, to make us commercially the most independent and prosperous nation of the earth, by furnishing and maintaining for all time to come a balance of trade in our favor.

Now, with these facts thus established by the irrefutable logic of figures, let me ask in all earnestness, is it wise, is it just to our suffering people, to waste our time on vain expedients? All effort for relief by tinkering with the currency will in the future, as in the past, prove abortive, so long as our great industrial interests remain prostrate. As well might this Congress attempt to regulate the ebb and flow of the tides by statutory law as to control the currency by any such means. The circulating medium of a country is not inaptly analogized to the blood of the human system, both the quantity and quality of which are regulated by certain fixed laws of nutrition which are peculiar to animal organism. And just so the amount of currency and the value thereof are indicated and determined by certain great principles that underlie the commerce and productive industries of the nation. Seeing this fact, then, let us take a broader and deeper view of the financial disturbance, and reaching down to the real cause of our troubles, apply the remedy there.

OUR FINANCIAL SYSTEM

is established. And whatever objections may be urged against some of its provisions, it certainly possesses the merit of security, based as it is upon the faith and credit of the American Government. Besides, it circulates currently everywhere throughout our broad domain. The only other requisite which it needs is uniformity of value, and to impart this we have only to declare it to be public and private, custom duties, and taxes. The Government is not only depreciating but actually repudiating its own currency, in refusing to receive it at the hands of the people. And so long as we thus continue to dishonor our own obligations, just so long will other nations discredit them. France has exemplified the fact that the credit of a nation, when wisely used, even in disastrous times, is an all-sufficient basis for currency.

Says Mr. Pliny Freeman, an able writer on finance:

If any continue to doubt, after our past experience, that legal-tender paper, when received for duties on imports, will keep on a par with coin, they need only to look across the Atlantic to the French government for confirmation. When the German war commenced, it authorized the Bank of France to double its issue, and made said issue a legal tender for all monetary purposes. According to statistics, at the commencement of hostilities in 1870, the bank circulation was about $250,000,000, when an addition of an equal amount was authorized, and all made a legal tender for all purposes; and when hostilities ceased, in 1871, it amounted to $420,000,000, at which time gold bore a premium of 2½ per cent., when, an additional amount being authorized, it soon fell to par; and in October, 1873, when it amounted to $612,000,000—the highest amount ever reached—it remained at par, and has continued so ever since. The query arises: Why did it continue at par after the issue of so large an amount? Because it was made a legal tender for duties on imports and for all other monetary purposes whatever. Then why was there a premium on gold at any time? For the reason that, in addition to the amount required for the indemnity, the requirements to recuperate and make good the desolations of war caused an excess of imports above exports, which excess continued until the increased flow of currency, by stimulating the manufactures, mechanical and agricultural industries, created an excess of exports, and turned the balance of trade in favor of France. It seems clear that the volume of currency, by being made a full legal tender, revived and stimulated the productive industries of the French people to such an extent that their exportable products soon exceeded their imports, and turned the balance of trade (which when the war commenced was largely against them) in their favor to such an extent as to render them financially independent, and all other nations became their tributaries. And who can say that, in consequence of the paper of the Bank of France being a full legal tender, the French people are not in a more prosperous condition at this time than at any time in their long and eventful history? With such wonderful prosperity of the people of France prominently in view, and the full knowledge of its being the result of so simple a cause as the making of its paper money a full legal tender, will not the American Government follow so glorious an example, and thereby raise our own people from their present state of paralysis, degradation, and humiliation?

Again, by making our greenbacks a full legal tender, we will at once remove all distrust from the minds of the people, and restore confidence to capital, without which confidence no currency, whether it be gold, silver, or paper, and in whatever amount it may exist, can be made available either for the demands of commerce or the wants of producers. It is owing to this want of confidence that money is seemingly so scarce and the rate of interest so high. A sense of insecurity has the effect to lock it up in the vaults of banks and private capitalists, and hence, while there is stagnation in the commercial centers, there is a corresponding paralysis in the rural districts, which is entailing upon producers want and distress. There is in reality no scarcity of money, if the supply we have could be brought into circulation. The following statement exhibits the amount of currency per capita in each of the following countries:

Great Britain	$23 66
France	36 85
German Empire	20 64
United States	18 06

While it is true that we have less currency in proportion to population than other leading nations, yet we have enough to answer the demands of commerce and production, if we can only make it available. If making our greenbacks a full legal tender for all purposes will accomplish for us what we have seen it did for France under similar circumstances, it will at once put our capital in active circulation, bring money into competition with money, and thereby reduce the rate of interest to a healthy standard, without resorting to the arbitrary and invidious legislation proposed by some on this floor. And here, in order to determine the necessity of procuring a lower rate of interest on loanable capital, let me call attention to the great disadvantage under which the producers of our country are placed as compared with those of other countries. The average rate of interest in Great Britain and Europe, our rivals in the production of grain, cotton, and all manufactured goods, does not exceed 3 per cent., and in the United States it is not less than 8 per cent. Thus it appears that the reduction of the rate of interest is one of the principal factors in our financial problem; for upon its proper solution the revival of our industries depends; and in my judgment the most speedy, effectual, and just means of accomplishing the end is to inaugurate the policy we have indicated, for by so doing we impart confidence and security to capital, while at the same time we give assurance of remunerative profits to labor.

No thoughtful mind can question for a moment the security of our legal-tender currency, when it remembers that it has for its basis the entire value of our industrial products, which are estimated by thousands of millions. And these products, after all that has been said and written, constitute the real value of a nation's wealth; while money, whether it be coin or paper, is only the measure by which their values are estimated in their exchange. We have shown that the abundance of gold in any country is necessarily the result of commercial prosperity, and not the cause of its prosperity; and hence, if we would ever reach the desirable point when resumption will be practicable, we must do so by legitimate means. It never has been, nor can it ever be, attained by a simple resumption act. A legislative fiat cannot call gold into existence! No arbitrary enactment of Congress can establish a gold basis so long as the demands of trade require a circulation of $750,000,000 of currency, and when there are only about $140,000,000 of coin in the country, and that small amount only here because it is needed to pay our custom duties and interest on the public debt. Suppose, Mr. Chairman, that the whole amount of gold coined by the United States Government from its foundation was in the vaults of the Treasury to-day, it would only amount to $1,200,000,000, and would not be sufficient to pay our foreign debt alone by $100,000,000. Now, under this state of facts, how is it possible for us to retain gold here in sufficient quantity to redeem our currency?

But let us go a step further, and suppose that we owed no foreign debt at all. We have already seen that for the past ten or twelve years the balance of trade against us amounts to an average of $115,000,000 per annum, so that only a few years would suffice to exhaust our supply of coin, and remand us to our present lamentable condition.

But, Mr. Chairman, the advocates of an early attempt at resumption point triumphantly to the history of the Bank of England, and tell us that when that institution was forced to suspend specie payments resumption was brought about by an act of Parliament; that when the wisdom of British statesmen deemed resumption proper, Parliament had only to fix a day, and the end was accomplished. Let us examine briefly the facts of history, and see how little of truth there is in this statement.

The Bank of England grew out of a necessity very similar to that which introduced a paper currency into our own country. The English were at first an agricultural people, and continued such long after many other nations of Western Europe had made advances in manufactures and commerce, and chief among them were the Dutch and French. When the increase of intelligence and population forced upon England a diversified industry, these nations already controlled the markets, and with their finer fabrics proved successful rivals against the coarser goods of England.

England found her best market in the colonial possessions of the eastern and western world, and for years she maintained a hard and an unequal struggle. The rude products of her looms and workshops were not prized upon the European continent, and wherever she found a market she met formidable competitors in Holland, France, and Spain, who were enabled to hold the mastery, supported as they were by extensive and well-appointed navies. England, however, seeing the advantages held by her rivals, went to work with unfaltering energy and enterprise to lessen the cost and improve the quality of her products, and at the same time to build up and strengthen her naval power. Just so soon as she found herself in condition to do so, she went about destroying the navies of her hitherto successful rivals; and then, seizing upon many of their colonial possessions, secured for herself a monopoly of the carrying trade and of markets for the sale of her surplus products. This policy gave her great wealth and power, and it has ever since been her proud boast that "Britannia rules the waves." And so completely has she sustained this supremacy, that she, together with other foreign nations—be it said to our shame—during the last fiscal year, appropriated to themselves 74 per cent. of the entire carrying trade of the United States.

During the twenty-six years that the Bank of England was in a state of suspension, Parliament fixed the day for resumption time and time again. But it never came until the spindles of Manchester and the forges of Birmingham overcame the combined military power of Europe, and turned the balance of trade in her favor. With her ships floating upon every sea, and bearing her vast products to almost every port within the confines of civilization, England at once became the manufacturer and carrier of the world, and then the millions of treasure which she had so lavishly expended in building up her industries and providing her navy began to flow back to her, until she became the great creditor nation of the earth, and then the resumption of specie payments followed as naturally as effect follows cause.

Again, we are told, Mr. Chairman, that the notes of the Bank of England and of the Bank of Switzerland have a par value with gold because upon the face of each is printed a promise to pay in gold, and hence, if a like promise was printed on our greenbacks, they too would at once appreciate to par value. But let us look and see the truth of this also. A note of the Bank of England has been for many years at a premium in this country, and why? The advocates of legislation fixing a day for early resumption say that it is because of its ready convertibility into gold! Hence a merchant will buy a thousand-pound note of the Bank of England, for which he pays $5,000 in gold and ¼ of 1 per cent. premium in addition, simply to enjoy its convertibility into gold at $5,000!

Now, sir, this fallacy is too glaring to deceive any thinking mind for a single moment. A better reason, and the true one, is found in the fact that we owe England a large commercial debt, and such debt must be paid in gold. To send the gold, the merchant must pay, not only a heavy freight, but heavier insurance, and to avoid these expenses and risks, which amount to more than the premium on the note, he purchases exchange on the Bank of England, incloses it in a letter paying only the postage, and his object is accomplished, the payment of his debt. The same thing is true of the Bank of Switzerland. That little country has a large balance of trade in its favor, and hence its notes answer the same purpose. It is a safe, cheap, and convenient medium of settling balances of trade, and hence its value. If we, too, had a balance of trade to our credit to-day, our legal-tender currency would be at a premium abroad with all countries who were our debtors, as was the case with the old United States Bank notes so long as our exports exceeded our imports.

Still another and with some a favorite plan of bringing about resumption is to purchase silver to replace the fractional currency and to hoard up gold until a certain contingency happens, and then pay it out. Buy gold and silver with the bonds of the Government and pay it out to banks and individuals to be exported from the country, to settle our foreign balances of trade as fast as it leaves the hands of the Treasury agent! Why, sir, such folly as this is but the re-enactment of the fable of the Danaides, who would fill vessels with water that had no bottoms. If we would fill the vessel, let us first put a bottom in it. And the only bottom which will enable our financial tub to hold water must be made out of a clear balance-sheet of trade in our favor.

The truth is, sir, that so long as we continue a

our greenback currency rests upon a surer and a more available basis than gold, for that basis is the value of the entire property and industrial products of our people. Gold, however great the store, has been, and may be again, exhausted by the revulsions of trade, but our wealth and products are exhaustless and perennial. They are increased and renewed with each returning season, and expanded by each succeeding generation; and so must they continue to be so long as mankind "multiply and replenish" and "the early and the latter rains" are sent upon the earth. Seeing, then, that our prosperity, national as well as individual, is mainly derived from and dependent upon our domestic industries; that commerce and trade are but the indices of their development; that the profits of money itself, whether it be gold, silver, or paper, are measured by the amount and facility with which the exchange of our commodities is effected, is it not time for us to turn aside from the selfish and vain expedients with which the meaner class of politicians feed the flames of sectional hate, and give our earnest attention to the ennobling work of reviving them? In so doing we shall become the instruments of establishing "peace on earth and good-will among men;" for we will thereby relieve them of their poverty and distress, in so far at least as legislative agency can accomplish it. Let us remember that our present currency is but the written pledge of the Government to place the products of labor where they can be utilized by the world that needs them, and that so long as we neglect to do this, just so long will the commercial world deride us by refusing to class our credit among the exchangeable credits of the nations.

Unlock the iron of the country, and let us supply our own wants, make available our immense coal-beds, give the food of the West to the cotton manufacturers of the East, help the stricken South to lessen the cost of producing the great staple of the world's commerce, and aid her to utilize her unequaled water-powers, and thus diversify her industries. And, when we shall have supplied the wants of our own people with food and clothing, then send off our millions of surplus products to meet the demand abroad, and by this plain, practical plan discharge our immense foreign debt. Then will specie flow back to our Treasury, and the vexed question of the currency be settled by natural solution, and, instead of disturbing our great industries, will steadily promote them, to the relief and happiness of the toiling millions of our countrymen who are to-day asking for bread and receiving a stone.

With the examples of England, France, and Russia fresh before our eyes, we need grope no longer in doubt and uncertainty as to how we can remedy the evils that now hang so heavily upon us, and reach the much-desired point of resumption. Encourage, as these nations have done, our domestic industries in every possible way. Reduce the expenditures of the Government to the lowest point compatible with the efficiency of its administration. Cut off every supernumerary. Repeal the iniquitous internal-revenue system, which bears so heavily on producers, who are taxed by it to the extent of $100,000,000 annually. Re-adjust the tariff in the interest of the products of all classes of labor in every section of the country. Practice economy in everything, and so commend it to our people. Husband the vast revenues of the Government, and apply them to the full development of our immeasurable resources, opening up our great natural highways of commerce; and thus remove the greatest obstacle to the utilization of our products. This policy will bring the people and the industries of the different sections into a closer alliance with each other, and teach them the invaluable lesson of mutual dependence of the one upon the other, as component parts of one vast political system. If we would restore prosperity and fraternity, Mr. Chairman, we must stop this perpetual warfare between labor and capital, between the cotton-producer and the cotton-spinner, between the iron-maker and the grain-grower.

Sir, we are suffering to-day the bitter fruit of this

UNNATURAL ANTAGONISM.

In former years it was fostered and fed by selfish and designing men, until it finally culminated in a fratricidal war which desolated the land from the Potomac to the Rio Grande. If the one-hundredth part of the treasure expended in that cruel conflict had been applied to building up and protecting the various industries of the different portions of the Union, the grievances and jealousies which precipitated it would not only have been avoided, but civil war at any time rendered impossible. And instead of the blood-stains and desolations which to-day mar the beauty of this great national structure, the bright smiles of peace, prosperity, and happiness would greet every eye and gladden every heart.

Mr. REA addressed the committee. Before concluding his remarks, which, as completed, will be found hereafter, he yielded to

Mr. HOLMAN, who said: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, with a view to moving in the House that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock for general debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. COX having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PRINTING OF TESTIMONY.

Mr. SINGLETON. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be, and they are hereby, authorized to have printed at once the testimony taken in the case, with the exhibits accompanying the same, in the matter of the investigation of the Government Printing Office.

The resolution was adopted.

CONTINGENT FUND.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Accounts:

Resolved, That the payment ordered by this House by resolution of the 20th of June, 1874, be, and the same is hereby, directed to be paid out of the contingent fund.

SPECIAL MESSENGER.

Mr. FORT, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Accounts, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a special messenger be, and is hereby, appointed to the managers of the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, and that the compensation of said messenger be fixed at $3.60 per day.

TEXAS AND PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. MACKEY, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Railways and Canals, reported back the petition of citizens of Clearfield County, Pennsylvania, in behalf of the Texas Pacific Railroad, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 3269) appropriating $50,000 for subsistence supplies for Apache Indians in Arizona Territory, and for the removal of the Indians of the Chericahua agency to San Carlos agency.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted Mr. SAVAGE for two weeks on account of sickness in his family.

HENRY HELBURN.

Mr. GAUSE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3365) granting a pension to Henry Helburn; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

RECESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening for general debate only.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will designate the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] to act as Speaker when the House resumes its session.

The House accordingly (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) took a recess until half past seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House at seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m. resumed its session, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is in session this evening for general debate on the post-office appropriation bill, in Committee of the Whole, no other business to be transacted.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask permission of the House to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD some remarks which I have prepared upon the river and harbor improvement bill, which was passed without any opportunity being afforded for discussion.

There was no objection, and leave was granted. [See Appendix.]

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. REA resumed and concluded his remarks. As completed, they are as follows:

FINANCES OF THE COUNTRY, ETC.

Mr. REA. Mr. Chairman, being a new member, I do not desire to hastily thrust myself into unnecessary and needless debate; but representing a constituency in one of the great central States of the Union who believe that much of the legislation of the Congress for a series of years last past has been antagonistic to their interests and prejudicial to their prosperity as well as the prosperity of the whole country—a constituency that are now suffering severely from the prostrate condition of the business of the country, and anxiously and almost despairingly looking forward to better times, to a revival of business—I feel it to be my duty to say something in my feeble way in their behalf, as well as the thousands of men and women in the United States who are out of employment and begging for bread; seeking remunerative employment, but can find none. These are perilous times; thousands of good business men have become bankrupt, and thousands more must soon follow. The whole people are demanding that something be done to give them at least prospective relief, and it behooves every Representative, who has to some extent in his keeping the weal or woe of the American people, to do and say all he can in behalf of the oppressed people.

It is wonderful to contemplate the growth of this country since the formation of the Government. The hardy sons of toil have felled the forests and plowed up the prairies and made them blossom with the rich golden grain for the food of man and beast, while the brawny arms of the workmen and mechanics have erected extensive manufactories, proud cities, palatial mansions, and other edifices, all for the accommodation of man. Railroads have been constructed. The iron rail now spans the continent and connects the two oceans together. The means of transit for commerce and travel is now at the door of almost every one. The telegraph has been invented and extended throughout the Union and across the ocean, by which the mad lightnings have been tamed and utilized and made the bearer of dispatches and intelligence. Steam and electricity have well-nigh annihilated time and space. Thousands of new and useful inventions have been made, institutions of learning have sprung up all over the country, the arts and sciences have been developed, and general intelligence diffused among the people.

When we contemplate the transcendent strides the American people have made in times past in agriculture, commerce, manufactures, the arts and sciences, we would naturally be led to believe that they were to-day prosperous and happy, that no one was willingly out of employment, that no one wanted for the luxuries, much less the necessaries of life; that such a person as a beggar or tramp asking for work that he or she might obtain even a poor subsistence was unknown to America. But, O, how different. Instead of prosperity there is adversity, the energies of the people are paralyzed, the value of every species of property except untaxed Government securities has been reduced, merchants and other business men have become bankrupts, labor is unrewarded, and thousands of men and women are now asking for remunerative labor without being able to obtain it. Why is this so? There must be a cause; every effect has its cause. Is it for want of energy and willingness on the part of the people to work and do? Is it for want of natural resources? Certainly not; the people are industrious, the country is rich in natural resources, rich in soil and minerals, with a good climate, and well adapted to a variety of products. The virgin soil has not refused to yield to the tillage of the husbandman; but, on the contrary, under the beneficent influence of a kind Providence large crops and full granaries have been the result.

To what, then, must we look for the cause of the present prostrate condition of the country? It is to be found in bad legislation, bad laws, and misgovernment.

During the war a large amount of paper currency was issued by the Government; and after the war closed, for several years the business of the country was done with a very large volume of currency, prices were thereby inflated, and debts were contracted upon that basis.

The policy of the contraction of the currency and the increasing of the gold interest-bearing debt of the nation have resulted in great disaster to the business of the country, and made thousands of good business men bankrupt without producing a specie basis; but, on the contrary, the currency to-day is at a large discount below gold; and it is proposed to still further contract the currency and increase the interest-bearing debt of the nation by selling interest-bearing bonds for gold or by funding the greenbacks into such bonds.

The people, I believe, are opposed to this policy. They are demanding the repeal of the specie-resumption act, by which it is proposed to resume specie payment in 1879. In order to arrive at an intelligent understanding of this financial question, it is necessary to take into account the coin in the country, the annual yield of our mines, the exports and imports to and from the United States, the public debt, and where and by whom that debt is held, and the amount of taxes the people are called upon to pay annually.

EXPORTS AND IMPORTS OF MERCHANDISE AND SPECIE.

I have carefully brought together, after much labor, a statement and exhibit of the exports and imports of merchandise and specie from the 1st day of July, 1862, to the 30th day of June, 1875, a period of thirteen years. I have made this statement and exhibit from the official reports on commerce and navigation and the prepared tables and exhibits made by Hon. Edward Young, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, and I presume it is approximately correct. It is as follows:

Table showing the specie values of domestic and foreign exports for the period of thirteen years ending June 30, 1875.

Fiscal year.	Merchandise.	Specie and bullion.	Total exports.
1863	$203,964,447	$64,156,611	$268,121,058
1864	158,837,988	105,396,541	264,234,529
1865	166,029,303	67,643,226	235,672,529
1866	348,859,522	86,044,071	434,903,593
1867	292,361,225	60,868,372	353,229,597
1868	281,952,899	93,784,105	375,737,004
1869	286,117,697	57,138,380	343,256,077
1870	392,771,768	58,155,666	450,927,434
1871	442,820,178	98,441,988	541,262,166
1872	444,177,586	79,877,534	524,055,120
1873	522,479,922	84,608,574	607,088,496
1874	596,483,099	66,630,405	663,113,504
1875	529,039,235	92,132,144	621,171,379
Total	4,665,894,869	1,014,877,617	5,680,772,486

Declared value of imports for thirteen years ending June 30, 1875.

Fiscal year.	Merchandise.	Specie and bullion.	Total imports.
1863	$243,335,815	$9,584,105	$252,919,920
1864	316,447,283	13,115,612	329,562,895
1865	238,745,580	9,810,072	248,355,652
1866	434,612,066	10,700,092	445,512,158
1867	395,763,100	22,070,475	417,833,575
1868	357,436,440	14,188,368	371,624,808
1869	417,506,379	19,807,876	437,314,255
1870	438,958,408	26,419,179	465,377,587
1871	520,223,684	21,270,024	541,493,708
1872	626,595,077	13,743,689	640,338,766
1873	642,136,210	21,480,937	663,617,147
1874	567,406,342	28,454,906	595,861,248
1875	533,005,436	20,900,717	553,906,153
Total	5,732,371,820	231,546,049	5,963,917,872

From this table you will see that the total imports of merchandise into the United States for that time were $5,732,371,820, to which may be added 3 per cent. for smuggling and undervaluation; that being the percentage estimated by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics necessary to cover the evasions of the revenue. And to these imports may also be added a large sum for freights paid foreign vessels in excess of freights received by American vessels. Hon. Edward Young, in 1873, estimated the balance of freights against the United States from 1863 to 1873 to be $124,882,456. This amount has been largely increased for the last two years, but I will say nothing about that and take his figures, and the import account stands as follows:

Imports of merchandise	$5,732,371,820
Three per cent. for smuggling and undervaluation	171,971,154
Freight	124,882,456
Total	6,029,225,430

The exports of merchandise from the United States during the same time, as shown by the table, were $4,665,894,869, which, taken from the imports, leaves a balance of $1,363,330,561 against the United States in the thirteen years next preceding the 30th of June last, so far as the exportation and importation of merchandise was concerned.

The table shows that during the same time the exports of specie and bullion amounted to $1,014,877,617 and the imports to $231,546,049. The exportation of specie and bullion exceeded the importation by $783,331,568, being an annual drain of exports of specie and bullion in excess of the imports of the same of $60,256,274.46. Take $783,331,568, the excess of exports of specie and bullion over the imports of the same, from the excess of imports of merchandise, and we have $579,998,993 as the excess of imports over the combined exports of merchandise, specie, and bullion during the thirteen years; showing an annual balance of trade against the United States, notwithstanding the large export of specie and bullion, amounting to $44,615,307, being over $1 per capita for every man, woman, and child in the United States. It is shown by the report on commerce and navigation for the year 1875 that the number of American vessels that entered into the United States from foreign countries during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, was 11,074, with crews aggregating 113,059, and carrying in the aggregate 3,573,950 tons. The number of American vessels, their tonnage and crews, that cleared from the United States for foreign countries was a little more than those that entered into the United States.

The number of foreign vessels that entered into the United States from foreign countries during the same time was 16,887, carrying 8,118,860 tons, with crews amounting to 250,493; and the number of such foreign vessels that cleared from the United States for foreign countries was a little in excess of the number that entered into the United States, and carried a few more tons and crews. From this it will be seen that about two-thirds of the exports from and imports into the United States have been carried in foreign vessels.

PUBLIC DEBT.

The public debt of the United States, as shown by the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury for the month of February, 1876, was on the first day of that month $2,114,960,306.80, besides sixty-odd millions of bonds issued to the Pacific railway companies, to say nothing about State, county, and municipal indebtedness, which would doubtless swell the total indebtedness to ——.

Unfortunately for the American people, a large portion of our indebtedness is owned and held in foreign countries, and various statements and estimates have been made as to the amount thus owned and held abroad.

In order to obtain as near as possible the amount of such indebtedness held abroad, I addressed a letter to Hon. Edward Young, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, who has given the subject much attention, for information, and received from him the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
March 10, 1876.

DEAR SIR: In response to your favor of yesterday, I have the honor to state that no data exist showing the amount of United States bonds held in foreign countries. The subject is one of great interest and several have made estimates upon it, most of which have been too large.

I send you herewith a volume of monthly reports for the fiscal year 1874, containing a summary of a more extended article which I wrote upon the subject, and which I regard as being approximately accurate. It is taken, as you will observe, from the "balance of trade" stand-point, and if I have made errors in any of the estimates, they can be corrected by others. As that was made two years ago, I am inclined to think that the United States, railway, and municipal bonds held abroad amount to from $1,300,000,000 to $1,350,000,000, of which perhaps two-thirds consist of bonds of the United States.

The monthly debt statement herewith inclosed shows the different descriptions of bonds, but it does not indicate which kinds are held in Europe.

It is a great source of regret to me that I have been unable, after a pretty thorough investigation in New York and elsewhere, to obtain more accurate data on the subject.

I shall feel obliged by your calling at the Office at your convenience and making yourself personally acquainted with our facilities for furnishing information.

Very respectfully, yours,

EDWARD YOUNG,
Chief of Bureau.

Hon. DAVID REA, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

From this letter it is seen that Hon. Edward Young estimates the amount of our bonds held abroad to be from $1,300,000,000 to $1,350,000,000, two-thirds of which consist of bonds of the United States. Many think this estimate too small. The annual interest on the foreign debt which has to be paid in coin is, say, $75,000,000; some put it much higher. Governor Tilden, of New York, in his last annual message to the Legislature of that State, says: "We have to pay to foreign creditors annually in coin more than $100,000,000." This may be nearer correct, but I will put it at seventy-five millions for the purposes of my argument.

GOLD AND SILVER IN UNITED STATES.

Hon. H. R. Linderman, Director of the Mint, in his annual report to the Secretary of the Treasury for fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, gives the following estimates of gold and silver coin in the United States at different times, in round numbers:

In year 1860	$275,000,000
1870	130,000,000
1872	140,000,000
June 30, 1873	140,000,000
30, 1874	166,000,000
30, 1875	142,000,000

Of the one hundred and forty-two millions in the United States last June, he says twelve to fifteen millions was in silver. He also shows that the total coinage of gold and silver into coin in the United States during the year ending June 30, 1875, was $43,854,708, and that the total product of the mines during the same time was a little less than $72,000,000.

From the figures I have given, which are taken from official documents, there is to-day $133,000,000 less of gold and silver in the United States than there was in 1860, being now but little over one-half as much as there was then.

The trade reports of commerce and navigation show that the exports of gold and silver from the United States since 1862 have exceeded the imports of the same $783,331,568, which was an annual excess of exports over imports of $60,256,274.46; nearly equal to the entire product of all our mines last year. It is also shown that it takes $75,000,000 annually in coin to pay the interest on our foreign debt, which is about $3,000,000 more than the entire product of the whole mines of the United States, and about $11,000,000 more than the coinage of gold and silver in the United States last year.

It is evident from these figures that unless the annual yield of our mines is greatly increased or the annual excess of exports of gold and silver is reduced, the present amount of $142,000,000 of gold and silver now in this country will diminish annually.

Upon the theory that $1 of specie in the vaults will float $3 in currency at par value, we to-day only have enough gold and silver to float $426,000,000 in currency at par, which would be $10.65 per capita, which is less than one-half of the circulation per capita of Great Britain, and less than one-fourth of that of France. No sane man believes that four hundred and twenty-six millions of currency would be sufficient to do the business of this vast country; and yet, in the face of all the facts, it is proposed that we shall go to specie payment on the 1st day of January, 1879, when we will have less gold than now, unless the balance of trade is made to cause the precious metals to flow to the United States rather than from her. It is believed that there is no prospect of a sufficient increase in the production of our mines to keep the volume of coin at what it now is without there is an avenue opened up for the influx of the same from foreign countries through the balance of trade in favor of the United States. The resumption of specie payment in 1879 by redeeming three hundred and seventy million legal-tenders and about the same amount of national currency with less than $142,000,000 coin is absolutely impossible.

INCREASE OF INTEREST-BEARING DEBT.

But it is proposed that interest-bearing bonds shall be issued and sold to procure coin with which to redeem the legal-tender currency, or else the legal-tender currency be funded into an interest-bearing debt by exchanging the same for interest-bearing bonds. The last proposition is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

I protest against both these propositions for several reasons, two of which I will now mention.

First. If such bonds are sold for coin in such manner as to increase our capital stock of coin they must be sold in foreign countries; and, as an American citizen and Representative, I am opposed to any increase of our foreign indebtedness. The American people are now almost hewers of wood and drawers of water to foreign capitalists.

Second. The interest-bearing debt of the United States is now all the people can bear. The hard-earned earnings of the people are taken now to pay the interest due bondholders. If this Government preserves its good faith and honor, as it ought to do, and pays its just debts and obligations, it will take a long time to do it and be a heavy burden upon the people, without increasing the interest-bearing debt.

I know the people are honest and desire to keep the pledges of their Government and pay its honest debts; and I beseech those who now hold the obligations of the Government and those who desire to still hold more of such obligations not to urge an increase in the interest-bearing bonds of the Government, and thereby, Shylock-like, demand the last pound of flesh and the last drop of blood. The people have all they can bear; the weight of taxation now falls heavily upon them; the families of many noble, brave, and honest men are now in want; and as certain as God lives these brave, noble men of this country will protect their wives and children, and save them from becoming beggars; they will not permit a load to be placed upon them that they cannot bear.

The currency in circulation, after deducting all reserves, is about $15.50 or $16 per capita. It is stated in a work written by Britton A. Hill, of Saint Louis, Missouri, that the money circulation in France is $47.22 per capita and in Great Britain $23.72 per capita.

Unless those countries have an excess of circulation, this country certainly has not a sufficiency. There the population is more circumscribed and dense than it is here, and hence checks and bills of credit can be used with more facility in business, and as a matter of fact a less volume of circulation per capita would accommodate all the wants of the people.

I do not believe any considerable number of the people in this country believe we have too large a volume of currency.

When we consider the uses for money, the large amounts of products to be moved from the great interior of this country to the seaboard, and the immense quantities of merchandise and valuables to be transported from the seaboards to the interior, a distance of hundreds and thousands of miles, the amount of taxes that are to be gathered in money from the people of all the States of this Union, it is hard for us to believe that we have too much money.

But it is said that we have rag-money, an inconvertible, depreciated currency, and that because our currency is at a discount of 12 to 14 per cent. therefore the depression of the business of the country. The financial distress of the country is by some attributed solely to our paper currency, and it is claimed that, if our currency was at par with coin, business would be prosperous, industry would revive, and the whole people would be on the high road to prosperity. I concede that the depreciation of the currency is detrimental to the business of the country, and no citizen desires more than I to see the currency of this country at par with gold; but it is certainly not true that the great distress among the people is because of the depression of the currency. That may be an auxiliary cause, but is by no means the sole cause.

The great drain upon the people in contributions to the national, State, and municipal governments in the form of taxation is the real cause of the distress now in the land. The net earnings of the people are not left with them for re-investment, by which the aggregate wealth of each individual is annually increased, but such earnings are taken from the owner by taxation and a large portion of the same is at once exported to Europe to pay European holders of our obligations.

Governor Tilden, of New York, in his last message, says:

> The aggregate Federal taxation of the eleven years now closing, computed in currency, from official statements, is more than $4,500,000,000. The local taxation, assuming the census statement for 1870 as an average, is more than $3,000,000,000. The aggregate taxation exceeds $7,500,000,000.

I do not know whether these statements are correct or not, but I suppose they are at least an approximation to the correct amount. Take this as a basis and assume that the entire population of the United States for the eleven years would reach forty millions, which it will not, and the amount of taxes per capita paid in the eleven years would be about $188, which would be to every head of family of five persons the large sum of $940. Such taxation as this is enormous; it almost amounts to confiscation; no people can be prosperous under such taxation. It is stated in that same message that the Federal and local taxes in 1860 were $4.90 per capita, and in 1870 $18.91 per capita; nearly four times as great in 1870 as in 1860. In 1860, as I have shown from the report of the Director of the Mint, there were two hundred and seventy-five millions of coin in the country; now we have one hundred and forty-two millions—but little over one-half the amount. Then the Government owed but little; now the national debt alone is over $2,000,000,000, and nearly a billion and a half dollars of our obligations are held abroad, and our coin is semi-annually leaving us and going into the coffers of foreign capitalists.

CONTRACTION OF CURRENCY.

The republican party has contracted the currency of the country and taken away from the people a large portion of the currency they had, without producing specie payment or appreciating the currency left, thereby depreciating the value of labor and all kinds of property except interest-bearing, non-taxable Government securities; and that party proposes to still further contract the currency and increase the interest-bearing debt. It passed a bill through this House the last session of Congress to resume specie payment in 1879 by selling the bonds of the Government payable in coin, bearing interest in coin, for the purpose of procuring gold to redeem the legal currency.

The power conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury by that act was to a very great extent unavailing, and now the Secretary asks that power be given him by Congress to fund the legal-tender notes into interest-bearing bonds, and that Congress also provide that the legal-tender notes shall not be a legal tender for liabilities incurred after the 1st day of January, 1877. That done, and, in my opinion, almost universal bankruptcy will follow; every business man who has liabilities, and does not have money on hand to pay the same, must fail. The volume of currency, which is not too large now for the business of the country, will be so contracted that the people will be unable to procure money to meet their demands for supplies and pay their taxes. The people are largely indebted and they would be unable to pay.

But we are told, in effect, that there is no debtor class in this country. The honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] said the other day:

There is no real difference between any two classes in this country. Demagogism can erect no barrier which common sense cannot tear down. The creditor class is more than twice as numerous as the debtor class. People constantly change from one to the other. The creditor to-day is the debtor to-morrow.

I do not know what relation the creditor and debtor class as to numbers bear to each other; but the honorable gentleman must remember that to the tax-gatherers of this country the whole people are indebted, and that about $275,000,000 are paid annually into the Federal Treasury, to say nothing about the amount paid as State and municipal taxes. The Government in turn does not owe one in a thousand of the people; in fact, the large amount thus paid into the Treasury is largely disbursed to foreign countries, and another very large amount is paid to comparatively a very few of our citizens who hold our securities.

But we are told by those who favor the retirement of the legal tenders that when that is done coin will flow into the country and take the place of the currency thus retired; that a demand for coin will be created; and that, in obeying the universal laws of supply and demand, coin will come in to supply the demand created by the retirement of the currency. This doubtless would be true if there were not other causes acting to prevent it. Let us examine this proposition in the light of the statistics and facts. As I have shown from official figures, we have in the United States $142,000,000 of coin. The annual product of our mines of gold and silver is a little less than $72,000,000; the annual coinage of our mints, a little over $43,000,000.

The annual exports of coin since 1862 have exceeded the imports of same by more than $60,256,274.46; the imports of merchandise since 1862 have exceeded the exports of the same by more than $1,000,000,000. How can coin flow in to supply the place of retired currency while these causes are acting? Our mines, it is true, add so much each year to our capital stock of coin, but it is lost in the excess of exports of coin and excess of imports of merchandise. Hence, we can see that, until the products of our mines are largely increased or the loss of our coin through exportation is prevented and the balance of trade made in our favor, thereby producing an influx instead of an efflux of coin, we cannot rely upon coin flowing in to supply the place of retired currency. Foreigners will not bring gold here and give it to the people. They must have something to exchange for it. To-day $1,350,000,000 of our obligations are held abroad. To pay the annual interest thereon in coin exceeds the entire products of our mines. How, then, is gold to accumulate in the United States?

The honorable gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] told us the other day that "the higher interest alone which is generally paid on this side of the Atlantic will always facilitate the floating of gold and silver to this country." Is that the way the supply of coin is to be had? Retire our greenbacks and let our business men borrow coin from abroad at a high rate of interest to supply the place of the currency retired, thereby increasing the debt of our people to foreign capitalists, virtually giving a mortgage upon this country to them? I do not believe the people and business men of this country desire that.

REPUBLICAN PARTY RESPONSIBLE.

The honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] a few days ago, in a speech upon this floor, attempted to hold the democratic party responsible for the present financial condition of the country. But no attempt, however able it may be, can make the democratic party responsible for the status of the finances of this country. The whole monetary system of finance is the work and production of the party to which the gentleman belongs. That party has been in power for fifteen years and has had full control of the legislation in both Houses of Congress and could pass any law it desired, and with proper legislation after the close of the war could have so developed the productions and interests of this country that our exports would have been largely augmented and our imports diminished, our foreign trade would have been in a healthy condition, and our currency would to-day be at par with coin. After laboring hard to cast the responsibility upon the democratic party, and doubtless feeling that something must be done to at least palliate the action of the republican party, and doubtless having a lurking belief at least that the country would not hold the democratic party responsible, the honorable gentleman from Maine made an attempt to excuse the republican party from responsibility. He said:

As matter of fact, however, I am quite willing to admit that during these ten years no positive and vigorous steps have been taken toward specie payment. So long as the business of the country was progressing reasonably well, it was not practicable or possible to set to work deliberately, without the pressure of necessity, to force specie resumption.

And further on he said:

But now the case is changed. Overtrading, the wild spirit of speculation, the undue expansion of credits, enormous investments in premature enterprises, have worked out their legitimate and inevitable results, and with a full volume of paper money the crash came; prices have fallen; settling day has arrived; painful liquidation proceeds, and the whole commercial and financial fabric is settling down on a solid foundation. Experience convinces where precept falls only on deaf ears, and to-day we have men by the thousand longing and asking for a return to specie who three years ago would have violently opposed it.

Here is an admission that the party for the ten years took no positive and vigorous steps toward specie payment, and the excuse offered is that the business of the country was "progressing reasonably well and it was not practicable or possible to set to work deliberately, without the pressure of necessity, to force specie resumption."

It will hardly satisfy the country to say that when the business of the country was "progressing reasonably well" it was not practicable or possible for the party in power to have taken steps toward specie resumption; not possible for the Congress to enact such laws as would foster the commerce and all the great business interest of this great nation; not possible for the Congress to enact laws that would nourish and facilitate the business of the country that was "progressing reasonably well" until the pressure of necessity came.

To state the proposition is but to state an absurdity. There could be no better time to adjust the finances upon a healthier foundation than when business was "progressing reasonably well."

There is no better time to prepare for adversity than in prosperity. It is the province of wise statesmanship to anticipate the near future, to know the dangers that beset the ship of state, and to provide the way to avoid the storm, or at least to conduct her through it with safety. But now the case is changed; the crash has come, the business of the country is prostrate, thousands of good business men have been made bankrupt, the production of the great staple articles that enter into exportation has been neglected. American ship-building has been well-nigh destroyed and American shipping and tonnage have been well-nigh driven from the seas, and now we are told that the republican party is the only party who can be intrusted with the reins of Government. Now that party is ready to do what it could not do when the business of the country was "progressing reasonably well," to wit, resume specie payment.

The honorable gentleman puts his party very much in the attitude of the doctor who administered medicine to throw his patient into fits so that he might cure the patient, as he was very efficient in the treatment of fits. The republican party has admirably shown to the country its ability to throw its patient into fits. It has succeeded well in producing a spasmodical condition in the finances and business of the country, and now we are told it is the only party that can be trusted with the control thereof; and I presume the reason therefor is because of its great similarity to the fit-doctor, its superlative ability to treat its patient when in a convulsive state.

The people do not understand that kind of treatment that makes it necessary to well-nigh kill the patient before a cure can be effected or even attempted. They will be slow to further trust the party that has so well conducted the business of the country from prosperity to adversity. They will be slow to believe that the democratic party, which has been powerless for fifteen years, is responsible for the present financial distress. They will not be deceived by such sophistry, and they will hold the party responsible that has had entire control of the Government in all its departments.

The honorable gentleman from Maine also said:

We have done much to maintain our public credit, but I think we began at the wrong end when we made special exertion to raise the price of our bonds and left the legal tender to take care of itself. Had we devoted our energies to bringing the legal tender to par with coin, the bond would have followed; but unfortunately we found that the reverse is not the case. For myself I confess I always feel ashamed to see our bonds quoted at a large premium while our legal-tenders are at a heavy discount.

Here is a confession that the Congress blundered, that it "commenced at the wrong end," and that the honorable gentleman feels ashamed of the result of that blunder. I trust he is not the only member of his party that feels ashamed. The leaders of the party that "began at the wrong end" should hide their faces in shame in the presence of the distress and bankruptcy that are now in the land.

The gentleman said:

We made special exertion to raise the price of our bonds and left the legal tender to take care of itself.

Who is "we?" The republican party in Congress, of course. To what special exertion did the gentleman allude? I presume he alluded to the action of Congress declaring that bonds that had been issued by the Government that were payable in the lawful money of the United States should be paid in coin. That is the special "exertion" that raised the price of the bonds that makes the gentleman "feel ashamed" when he sees them quoted at a large premium. Who could not then see that it was beginning at the wrong end? Who could not then see that, if the lawful paper money of the United States, the legal tender, had been appreciated to par, bonds would have followed? Is the party that was unable to see that to be intrusted with the further control of this question? Is it the only party that can be intrusted?

The bonds were held and owned by a few capitalists, a large portion thereof in foreign countries, who had purchased them in many instances at a heavy discount, at a time when they were payable in the lawful money of the United States. The greenbacks were lawful money and were in the hands of the great body of the people. A republican Congress "made special exertion" to raise the price of these bonds and left the legal tender to take care of itself, thereby legislating millions into the pockets of the capitalists at the expense of the toiling millions of America's noblest sons. And this was so potential and powerful to bring American citizens to shame that it has even reached the honorable gentleman from Maine, and so affected him that in a studied and prepared speech in the American Congress he has made an open confession of shame to the American people who have been so outraged. I commend that honesty that prompts a Representative to confess the sins and errors of his own party.

I charge that the republican party in Congress has been legislating in the interest of capital and of the few at the expense of the great body of the people, and I submit the speech and open confession of the honorable gentleman from Maine in support of the charge.

WHAT SHOULD BE DONE.

What should now be done to relieve the country? What can Congress do to give relief? This is the great question; it is the one in which the whole people of this country are interested. I do not believe it is in the power of legislation to at once restore the country to prosperity. Time, through the healthful laws of trade, is necessary. But I believe Congress can do much toward relief. It can do much toward producing a healthy condition in our finances and of our commerce.

Congress should at once repeal the resumption act. The people demand it. It is a fraud and a cheat. No considerable number of men pretend to say that we can go to specie payment in 1879 under the provisions of that act. The people of this country do not favor the conversion of our legal-tender currency into an interest-bearing debt. The contraction of the currency should at once be stopped. The volume is now doubtless too small for the business of the country. I do not believe the Government, however, should adopt a policy of unlimited inflation, and I would not favor such a policy.

I believe Congress should pass a law providing for the reception of at least a portion of duties on imports in greenbacks. Many believe that the Government should receive all duties on imports in greenbacks, and take the chances of buying gold to pay the interest on our bonds. That might be best; it might work well. I cannot say it would not, and I would much prefer to see the Government do that rather than do nothing. But the proposition for the Government to go into the market to buy gold is certainly open to some objections. Gold is now an article of merchandise, and the Government being a party in the market to either sell or buy gold, or both, tends to keep it an article of sale and purchase rather than a circulating medium as money or a basis for a circulating currency. Hence I believe it the wiser course at present to provide for the payment of a portion of the duties in coin, enough to enable the Government to raise coin sufficient to pay its gold interest on the public debt; but every cent of duty over that should be payable in greenbacks. I believe this would appreciate the value of the greenback. It would be a safe course, and after testing it, if it was discovered that the Government could safely receive the whole of the import duties in greenbacks without paying a large premium on coin and becoming a purchaser of coin in the market to such an extent as to materially encourage coin as an article of merchandise, then the Government should at once make legal-tenders receivable in payment of all duties. The Government depreciates its own paper by refusing to receive it in payment of all the dues to the Government. If the Government could make it receivable in payment of all public dues, without forcing itself into the market as a purchaser of coin, I believe the greenback would at once appreciate to par, or nearly so. But if, in attempting to appreciate the greenback to par by making it receivable for all dues, the Government should force itself into the market as a purchaser of coin, that fact would tend to hold coin as an article of merchandise and to keep up a premium thereon; so that, taking all things into consideration, I think it safest at present to make greenbacks receivable for a portion of the duties only, and see how that works before going further. Every thing should be done by the Goverument that can be to appreciate the currency to par with coin; that done, and the coin ceases to be an article of merchandise and goes into circulation as money, and thereby the volume of circulation is increased and our currency made better.

I would not demonetize gold and silver. That system of finance that would demonetize gold and silver and rely exclusively upon a paper currency without any relation whatever to gold and silver is certainly, to use mild terms, a very wild system.

Gold is the money of the world, and as long as that is so no nation that is a commercial nation can afford to demonetize the same. Suppose gold was not the money of the world, but that all nations had an exclusively paper currency, each one of course having its own. How would matters then stand? In the commerce between nations in what money would the balances of trade be paid? As a matter of course, if there was no money but paper money it would have to be paid in the paper money of the debtor nation. Suppose in such case that in the course of the commerce between the United States and Great Britain, for instance, the balance in our favor should be, say, $100,000,000, and that sum should be paid to the American citizens who were entitled to it in the paper currency of Great Britain and thereupon war would break out between the two countries. What would that paper money be worth? Of course it would be worthless; the holders would lose it. But if that $100,000,000 were paid in gold it would be as good in the hands of our American citizens after war came between the two countries as before. If it were in foreign coins it could be coined into American coin. We must not lose sight of the fact that gold is the money of the world and is the money in which the balances of trade between nations must be paid.

Again, I would not demonetize coin, because that would destroy millions of dollars of wealth that we have in our mines of gold and silver.

The national-bank currency should be retired and Treasury notes substituted in its place. This should be done gradually and in such manner as to not be in bad faith with the banks and not to oppress the holders of the national currency. The national banks savor too much of monopoly to suit the people of this country. They can increase or diminish the volume of currency in circulation at their will, and that is a dangerous power to intrust to a few banks and corporations.

I believe much might be done toward general relief in the way of adjusting tariff duties. Duties should only be levied for revenue purposes, and should be so adjusted as to fall mostly on the wealthy, who are most able to pay. Much of the revenue is now, in fact, collected from the labor of the country.

The labor of the country is its real wealth. It is that that produces property, brings forth from the earth by the sweat of the brow of hundreds of thousands of honest, toiling agriculturists millions of dollars annually, which is added to the capital stock of the nation.

Too much of the property and wealth of this country is exempt from taxation. It seems to have been a studied policy to relieve the wealth of the country from taxation.

INCOME TAX.

I believe that a properly adjusted income tax would be a wise measure at a time when of necessity the Government is compelled to collect such large sums of money from the people.

When taxes are low, even should they not be very wisely adjusted, the people do not feel the effect of an unwise adjustment; but when the taxes of a nation annually approximate its entire increase in wealth, then the adjustment of such taxes should be very skillfully and wisely done; and all property should, if possible, be made to bear its equal portion of the burdens of taxation. I know there are some very serious objections to an income system of taxation. It is inquisitorial in its character, and should probably not be resorted to except in times of extreme heavy taxation.

Every intelligent gentleman knows that there are thousands of capitalists and wealthy persons in this country who pay comparatively but little or no taxes, holders of large amounts of untaxed Government securities, who are receiving from the hard earnings of the people of this country large incomes in the way of interest.

No class of people can afford to pay taxes better than those who have been fortunate and made large incomes. These incomes are made because of the protection of the laws of the country. I have made an examination into the reports of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue from the creation of an income tax in 1864 to the year 1872, when the income tax ceased, and I find that there was collected during that time from incomes the sum of $341,706,036. During a part of this time I believe there was exempt from the net income of each head of a family $600, and a part of the time $1,000, which was allowed each head of a family in each year for the support of his or her family.

This large sum of revenue, amounting to nearly one-third more than the total revenue of the United States during the last fiscal year, and nearly equal to all the greenbacks in the United States at this time, was collected from incomes over the exemptions above mentioned; collected from those who could well afford to pay them; collected largely from those who without an income tax would pay but little or no taxes; much of it collected from those who hold large amounts of untaxed Government securities—collected from the wealthy classes of the people, and relieved labor and the poorer classes from governmental exaction of that large sum of money. But this income tax was repealed, and the large amount of taxes that would have been collected from incomes and from those who were well able to pay taxes without feeling the burden of taxation has been and is being collected from the poorer classes—those who are least able to pay taxes. Why relieve those so able to pay taxes at a time in the history of this country when taxation is almost unbearable? There can be no good reason for it. No wonder the people believe that the legislation of this country for years has been in the interest of capital and monopoly and against the interest of labor and the great mass of the people.

It is the wisdom of legislation to so adjust the taxes as to relieve labor and the poorer classes and let the burden fall on those most able to bear the same. Monopolies and capitalists can have lobbyists here to look after their interest, but the poorer classes, the great mass of the people, are unable to hire lobbyists to represent their interests, but must rely upon their representatives to protect their rights; therefore the eyes of the representatives should ever be turned toward the people who have intrusted their interests into their hands.

EXPENSES OF GOVERNMENT.

The expenses of the Government can be cut down, I believe, safely thirty or forty million dollars from what it has been for years past. I am glad to say that the Committee on Appropriations and this House have done so much already in that direction despite the opposition that has been made by the other side. I feel sure those on this side of the House are firmly impressed with the absolute necessity of rigid economy in all the public expenditures, and I hope the pruning-knife will not be spared wherever it can be applied without detriment to the public service.

Economy in public matters will beget economy in private life. Reasonable economy in all Government officials and Government matters will beget economy among the people and will run down through all the ramifications of public and private life, and thereby millions of dollars will be saved.

I have shown that the great drain upon the coin of this country by foreign countries is more than equal to the annual productions of our mines. How then can we as a nation restore our finances to a healthy condition and reach specie payments, so much talked of? That is to be done by increasing the productions of this country that enter into our exports and bring us the gold, and by increasing the productions of articles that we import for consumption, thereby retaining a large amount of coin that we now pay to foreign nations, and by receiving coin from abroad for our increased exports, thereby causing the flow of coin to the United States instead of from it; that once done and our financial question is settled, and I believe it is the only solid basis upon which it can be settled.

And in support of this view I hope the House will pardon me for quoting from a speech delivered a short time ago by Governor Hendricks, of Indiana, at New Orleans, one of the nation's wisest statesmen, and one whom I believe the nation can safely trust. He is reported in the papers as having said:

> And I now come to two questions of the highest importance to every tax-paying community in the United States; how can you add and how much to the wealth of the country by an increased production of articles of exports? That is the first question. The second is this: How and how far can you prevent the loss of national wealth by increasing your production of articles which we now largely import? * * * Every bale of cotton and hogshead of tobacco laid upon the wharves of Liverpool and Havre add to our supply of gold, for they command the gold at once; and every pound of rice and sugar and every gallon of molasses produced here in the State of Louisiana save us importing so much, and thus retain the gold in the country.

And further on he is reported as having said:

> And if you thus annually add $50,000,000 to our supply of gold, and if a rigid economy be introduced and observed so as to reduce our national expenditures forty or fifty million dollars more, our financial questions will be solved. Gold and silver will accumulate; the difference in commercial value between them and our paper currency will rapidly decrease.

Again, he said:

> But the wildest theorist would hardly ask us to base our hopes of a return to specie payment on a complicated and ingenious plan of borrowing gold that would be sure to disappoint us and would very probably lead us into still more serious perplexities.

COUNTRY WANTS PEACE.

The country wants peace. The bitter feelings between the people of the North and South engendered during the war have been kept alive too long by designing politicians. The people of the East and West, the North and South, should regard each other not as enemies, but as friends and brothers of one common country, subject to one common destiny. The citadel of liberty is of that tender and delicate character that to invade it in any of its parts by taking from the people of any of the States their constitutional rights is to endanger the entire fabric and to tear away from the whole people the broad mantle of constitutional liberty. The hard times following the panic have made the people of this whole country feel that they have one common interest, one common country, and one common destiny. The cruel god of war has curbed his gnashing teeth of vengeance. Our troubled waters have been assuaged, and the anxious dove of peace and hope has again returned to our land bearing in her beak the olive leaf.

Every attempt to fan into flames the smothered embers of ill-will now so nearly extinguished between the people of the North and South by holding up to the public gaze the horrors and sufferings of the late war, whether that attempt come from the North or the South, whether it be made in the pulpit, on the rostrum, or in the halls of legislation, should meet the solemn, stern rebuke of every lover of his or her country and its future destiny. The bloody-shirt business will not do. The people want something else, something substantial. And to all these things I would add reformation in all the departments of the civil service. The ulcer of political and social demoralization, which is eating away the life of the Government, should be permanently eradicated at once. Every intelligent citizen must know that the Republic cannot long survive the destructive elements now at work.

The safety of republican institutions exists only in the intelligence and virtue of the people. The Government should teach by example; purity should exist in high places. The Government should foster every means for the education and diffusion of general intelligence among the people. It is the people that constitute the Republic. In the language of another:

> What constitutes a state?
> Not high-raised battlement or labored mound,
> Thick wall or moated gate;
> Not cities proud with spires and turrets crowned;
> Not bays and broad-armed ports,
> Where, laughing at the storm, rich navies ride;
> Not starred and spangled courts,
> Where low-browed baseness wafts perfume to pride;
> No; men, high-minded men,
> With powers as far above dull brutes endued
> In forest, brake, or den,
> As beasts excel cold rocks and brambles rude,—
> Men, who their duties know,
> But know their rights, and, knowing, dare maintain,
> Prevent the long-aimed blow,
> And crush the tyrant while they rend the chain;
> These constitute the state.

CORRUPTIONS IN HIGH PLACES.

Sir, the great tyrant and enemy to the liberties of the people in this country are the corruptions in high places. There seems to have been a general disregard for the rights of the people among officials. Rings and combinations have been formed for corrupt purposes among officials and men in high places, and by such means the laws have been violated, the people's money stolen. These rings have been so strong as to baffle all the authorities, and I predict that if the full extent of these organizations and their doings is hereafter made known, the American people will learn that they as yet know but little of their magnitude and extent. I do not desire in a partisan spirit or for partisan purposes to make the charge that I am now about to make; but in the interest of truth, good government, and the rights of the people I am compelled to say that these rings and corruptions have existed in high places for years past, and that during that time the republican party has been in full power in all the departments of Government. Fraud and corruption have not existed to such an extent in any other period of the country's history.

That frauds and corruptions usually follow civil wars is doubtless true. But the republican party has shown itself incompetent, whether willingly or otherwise makes no difference, to put a stop to these frauds and corruptions. It is true investigating committees have been created in almost every Congress when the press of the country was pressing the frauds and corruptions upon the attention of Congress, but these investigating committees appear to have been skilled in but one thing, and that was the use of the whitewash-brush, and the result has been whitewashing reports. The investigations by this Congress have developed startling frauds and corruptions. The country is indebted to the democrats in this House for the exposures of the frauds and corruptions that have been made. These investigations and exposures have caused one high in official position to resign his position in hot haste; and that resignation was also in hot haste accepted by the President, and is now being used to save that resigned officer from impeachment. For what purpose and with what intention that resignation was made and accepted I will leave the country to judge.

It is believed that, if the witness Kilbourn had answered truthfully the questions propounded to him which he refused to answer and produced the books required by the committee, still other startling and gigantic frauds and corruptions would have been made known and exposed. But the witness refused to answer and to produce the books, and the House, in the constitutional exercise of its privilege and the only power known to the law to compel an unwilling witness to answer, imprisoned the witness after hearing his written defense. A Federal judge of the District of Columbia, an appointee of the President, has released the witness from the imprisonment and held for naught the order of imprisonment of the House, so that to-day the 40,000,000 people of this country are confronted with the monstrous doctrine that when Congress, one of the co-ordinate branches of the Government, attempts to examine a witness relative to a matter in which the whole people are directly interested and which may involve some one or more who is or has been in high places in the gravest and most gigantic frauds and corruptions, all the witness has to do is to refuse to answer the interrogatories propounded to him, and if the people, through their Representatives in Congress, in the only manner known to the law and the rules governing parliamentary bodies, attempt to compel the witness to answer by imprisonment, a Federal judge, an appointee of the President, can release the unwilling witness from the imprisonment by the pretended virtue of the writ of habeas corpus and thereby stop investigation, and say to the Congress and through the Congress to the whole people of this country, "You cannot compel this witness to answer," thereby destroying the independence of this co-ordinate branch of the Government and supplanting it at the pretended judicial feet of one man. Verily we have drifted into the doctrine of the one-man power. I am not one of those who believe in the Congress trenching upon the constitutional rights and powers of the other co-ordinate branches of the Government, neither do I believe that Congress, as a co-ordinate branch of the Government under the Constitution, should surrender any of its constitutional rights and powers, nay, its duties, to any other branch of the Government. It is the constitutional duty of Congress to retain and exercise at the proper time and in the proper manner the powers and duties conferred on it by the Constitution and laws of the land.

Sir, I believe redemption is yet possible. I believe the keen sagacity of the people will detect and prevail.

The whole matter is with the people. They can thrust aside the danger. They can crush the tyrant and rend the chain. They have a staunch weapon, the ballot:

A weapon that comes down as still
As snow-flakes falling on the sod;
But executes a freeman's will,
As lightning does the will of God.

REPEAL OF SPECIE RESUMPTION ACT.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to present some views upon the question of the repeal of the so-called specie-resumption act. I deem them not inappropriate in this connection, the question of currency being so intimately blended with that of economy in the public expenditures as a means of relief in times like the present.

On the 14th of December I introduced the following bill, providing for an unconditional repeal:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Under the rules the bill was required to be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, where it still remains awaiting its action. What is there in the history or provisions of that act to entitle it to the confidence or support of this House or the country? It was conceived in a party caucus, and pressed through Congress, without discussion or amendment, by a strictly partisan vote, not one democrat in either the Senate or House having given it his support.

Speaking of the republican party, Senator SHERMAN, chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, who reported the bill to that body, took occasion to state in the late Ohio canvass that—

It went into the canvass last fall divided in its councils, and silent, when it should have spoken. The result was our defeat, and the restoration of the democratic party to power in the House of Representatives, with some eighty confederate officers to represent the lost cause. When Congress met at its last session this severe defeat had one good effect, at least, in convincing republican members of Congress that a party charged with the administration of the Government must be able to agree upon the most pressing question of the time. The result was, after the most careful deliberation—after the frequent exchange of opinions, after mutual concessions by republicans of differing opinions, Congress did pass a law which does definitely declare a public policy, and provides ample means to restore our currency to the gold standard by the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879.

In caucus, of course—

Party necessity, not the public weal, was the controlling agency. I need not enlarge upon this. It is a matter of notorious history, and it is to be regretted that the prosperity and happiness of the people should be thus subordinated to the mere success of any political party.

But what are the provisions of this remarkable act? They are embraced in three sections. The first relates to the substitution of subsidiary silver coin for the fractional currency; and the second, to the coinage of gold bullion by the Government free of charge to the holders. These two sections, however, are comparatively immaterial to my present inquiry. The third section contains the gist of the act. I will ask the Clerk to read it, that we may the better comprehend it.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That section 5177 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, limiting the aggregate amount of circulating notes of national banking associations, be, and is hereby, repealed; and each existing banking association may increase its circulating notes in accordance with existing law without respect to said aggregate limit; and new banking associations may be organized in accordance with existing law without respect to said aggregate limit; and the provisions of law for the withdrawal and redistribution of national-bank currency among the several States and Territories are hereby repealed. And whenever so often as circulating notes shall be issued to any such banking association so increasing its capital or circulating notes, or so newly organized as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem the legal-tender United States notes in excess only of $300,000,000 to the amount of 80 per cent. of the sum of national-bank notes so issued to any such banking association as aforesaid, and to continue such redemption, as such circulating notes are issued, until there shall be outstanding the sum of $300,000,000 of such legal-tender United States notes, and no more. And on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem in coin the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding on their presentation for redemption, at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York, in sums of not less than $50. And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemption in this act authorized or required, he is authorized to use any surplus revenues from time to time in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par, in coin, either of the descriptions of bonds of the United States described in the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions, to the extent necessary to carry this act into full effect, and to use the proceeds thereof for the purposes aforesaid. And all provisions of law inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. SOUTHARD. It will be observed that provision is here made for the extension and perpetuation of the national banking system, for the redemption and extinguishment of the whole volume of United States legal-tender notes, and for the sale of Government bonds to procure gold and silver with which to redeem the legal-tender notes and fractional currency. The redemption of the legal-tender notes is to begin at the rate of 80 per cent. of the increase of national-bank notes, and to continue until the whole volume of legal-tender notes outstanding shall not exceed three hundred millions, and ultimately, and as early as the 1st day of January, 1879, the remaining three hundred millions are to be redeemed, on demand, in coin.

For this purpose of redemption, since there are no surplus revenues to be applied, a sufficient amount of gold must be procured by sale of Government bonds. The present condition of the Treasury is most unhopeful. The Secretary informs us in his last annual report that he is compelled to sell portions of the scanty supply of gold on hand to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government. His language is:

The Secretary regrets that the condition of the Treasury has been such as to render it necessary to make sales of gold coin from time to time to meet the current expenditures payable in currency. Such sales have been made in New York City, upon public notice, in accordance with the plan previously adopted, and have been limited from month to month to the amount necessary to meet probable demands upon the Treasury under existing appropriations.

We are further informed by the Secretary that it will be very difficult if not quite impossible to accumulate coin sufficient in the time allotted to carry the act into effect. He says:

The act confers large powers on the Secretary of the Treasury, touching the issue of United States bonds for the purpose of procuring the supply of gold necessary to execute such of its provisions as go into immediate operation, and to provide for the redemption in gold of United States notes outstanding on and after the 1st of January, 1879. In this respect the power conferred on the Secretary is ample; but if, for any cause, it should be found impracticable to accumulate in the Treasury a sufficient amount of gold to carry out the provisions of the act, the Secretary is left without the choice of other means to accomplish the end. It may, perhaps, be doubted whether the process of accumulating a large amount of gold by a given time could go on without meeting opposition from the financial powers of the world. It is safe to say that so large an amount of gold as would be required to carry out the purpose and direction of the act cannot be suddenly acquired. It can be done only by gradual processes, and by taking advantage of favorable conditions of the money market from time to time.

The act, however, peremptorily requires the Secretary to do precisely what he declares cannot be done. It compels him to accumulate "a large amount of gold," not by "gradual processes" and by taking "advantage of the favorable conditions of the money market from time to time," but to "suddenly acquire," and by a given time—that is, by the 1st of January, 1879—an amount sufficient to redeem some three hundred and seventy millions of legal-tender notes now outstanding. The law is imperative, absolutely and unconditionally requiring him to have ready the coin at whatever cost or hazard. He must do this, notwithstanding he may thereby derange the money market, enhance the premium on gold, unsettle all values, paralyze the business of our own country, and provoke the "opposition of the financial powers of the world."

But suppose the necessary amount of gold could be procured, what then would be the result? Simply this: The three hundred and eighty-two millions of legal-tender notes which were outstanding at the date of the passage of the act would be funded into interest-bearing bonds, the greenback promise to pay would be converted into a bond promise to pay, the debt bearing no interest into a debt bearing interest. This exchange would cost the people a large annual interest. But this would not be the most serious difficulty resulting. The legal-tender notes possess a dual character. They are not only a debt of the Government, but the currency of the people. They are made receivable for many public and all private debts. With the dearth of gold that exists in the country, they serve a useful and quite an indispensable function as money. When the process of redemption shall have been completed, that coin sufficient will remain to satisfy all the purposes of a legal tender in the extended business transactions of the country is a result which no one can predict with any degree of certainty. The strong probability is that such will not be the case.

The act is based upon the assumption that the legal-tender notes are the sole disturbing element in our finances. They are suddenly become "worthless." The time was, however, when the republican party did not make this avowal. The epithets of "rag-baby" and "cabbage-leaves" are of recent origin and application. The President, in his annual message of 1873, bore this testimony to the high character of this currency:

The experience of the present panic has proved that the currency of the country, based as it is upon the credit of the country, is the best that has ever been devised. Usually in times of such trials currency has become worthless or so much depreciated in value as to inflate the values of all the necessaries of life as compared with the currency. Every one holding it has been anxious to dispose of it on any terms. Now we witness the reverse. Holders of currency hoard it as they did gold in former experiences of a like nature.

And the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report of the same year, said:

Entire confidence was manifested in United States notes, and even in national-bank notes, and they were drawn wherever they could be obtained, and were largely hoarded with as much avidity as coin was ever hoarded in times of financial distress when that was the circulating medium of the country.

I pass by the fact that during a period of war the republican party authorized all the issues of legal-tender notes, and come down to the post bellum period. It should be remembered that a republican Supreme Court declared these notes lawful money and a legal tender and that in a time of profound peace, in the year 1874, a republican Congress had such entire faith in them that it passed an act increasing the volume to four hundred millions. This was done as a measure of relief in the then prevailing financial crisis. There was a general belief in the efficacy of the means, and especially in that section of the country now so urgently insisting upon the retirement of the existing volume.

Referring to the crisis, in his annual report of 1873, the Secretary of the Treasury says:

In this condition of things great pressure was brought to bear upon the Treasury Department to afford relief by the issue of United States notes. The first application came from a number of gentlemen in New York, suggesting that no measure of relief would be adequate that did not place at the service of the banks of that city $20,000,000 in United States notes, and asking that the assistant treasurer at New York should be authorized to issue to those banks that amount of notes as a loan upon a pledge of clearing-house certificates secured by ample collaterals and for which certificates all the banks were to be jointly and severally responsible.

This being declined, the Secretary further says:

Subsequently the New York Produce Exchange made a proposition to accomplish the same result in a different form, and also requested, as others had before, that the Secretary should pay at once the twenty-million loan of 1858.

Again he adds:

It should be stated, in the excitement there were many persons in the city of New York who insisted with great earnestness that it was the duty of the Executive to disregard any and all laws which stood in the way of affording the relief suggested by them—a proposition which indicates the state of feeling and the excitement under which applications were made to the Secretary of the Treasury to use the public money, and which, it is scarcely necessary to add, could not be entertained by the officers of the Government to whom it was addressed.

It is worthy of remark here, that the officers of the Government finally yielded in so far as to cause to be issued twenty-six millions of legal-tender notes, contrary to what was then generally claimed, and is now conceded to have been, the law. To-day, however, we find the policy wholly reversed. The same republican Congress which, in 1874, declared by its solemn act an increase of legal-tender notes necessary as a means of relief, in 1875, while the financial crisis was still impending, declared the destruction of the whole existing volume alike necessary for the self-same purpose. The legal-tenders are to be redeemed—that is, paid off and canceled—not appreciated to par and maintained as a part of the circulating medium.

But where is the specie basis or the system whereby, for the future, the paper money is to be made convertible into coin at the will of the holder? The specie basis, to be of any practicable value, must not only be reached but kept. To maintain it, it is not enough that the legal-tenders be funded. Something more is required. There must be a supply of coin. We have the high authority of the President's annual message of 1873 for the doctrine that—

A specie basis cannot be reached and maintained until our exports, exclusive of gold pay for our imports, interest due abroad, and other specie obligations, or so nearly so as to leave an appreciable accumulation of the precious metals in the country from the products of our mines.

However that may be, it is certain that the state of business, trade, and commerce has much to do with the question of gold supply. These natural conditions are entirely overlooked. Nay more, the act, as if to particularly avoid the permanent establishment of the specie basis, removes the limitation upon the issue of national-bank notes, without making any provision for the convertibility of the notes into coin at the will of the holder. Existing banks may increase their circulation and new banks be organized, says the act, "in accordance with existing law without respect to said aggregate limit." And under existing law no reserve, either in coin or paper, is required to be held on circulation. The act approved June 20, 1874, released the banks from this obligation. An exception only exists in relation to those banking associations organized for the purpose of issuing gold notes, which are still required to retain a reserve of 25 per cent. of gold and silver coin on their circulation. As to all other banks there is complete exemption, and their issues may be increased to any extent to which bonds may be procured as security. It has been supposed that such free banking would not be safe until the specie basis had been reached and provision made for securing redemption. It was upon this condition that the President ventured the suggestion of free banking in his annual message of 1873. He said:

In view of the great actual contraction that has taken place in the currency, and the comparative contraction continuously going on due to the increase of population, increase of manufactories, and all the industries, I do not believe there is too much of it now for the dullest period of the year. Indeed, if clearing-houses should be established, thus forcing redemption, it is a question for your consideration whether banking should not be made free, retaining all the safeguards now required to secure bill-holders. In any modification of the present laws regulating national banks, as a further step toward preparing for resumption of specie payments, I invite your attention to a consideration of the propriety of exacting from them the retention, as a part of their reserve, either a whole or a part of the gold interest accruing upon the bonds pledged as security for their issue. I have not reflected enough on the bearing this might have in producing a scarcity of coin with which to pay duties on imports to give it my positive recommendation. But your attention is invited to the subject.

The act retains "all the safeguards" then required "to secure bill-holders," but the means of "forcing redemption" is entirely omitted. Neither is there a reserve of "either the whole or a part of the gold interest accruing upon the bonds," as a redemption fund. Specie resumption, or convertibility of the bank-notes into coin on demand, finds no recognition in the act. All means of securing this is remitted to future legislation, if, indeed, we are ever to have the element of convertibility infused into national-bank notes. It is no answer to this to say that after the retirement of the legal-tenders there will be no other "lawful money" in which the banks may redeem their notes than gold and silver, and that, therefore, they will be compelled to redeem in coin. Neither the naked declaration of the law nor the prudence of bankers is sufficient for this purpose. To insure convertibility, the means must be provided. In the power of the holder of a note to obtain present convertibility rests all the advantages of the specie basis. This power is not conferred, for there is no coin reserve to effectuate it. The security through deposit of bonds is ample to insure the ultimate redemption of the notes, but not present convertibility. This security is now operative for this purpose, and as much so as it will be after the legal-tenders are retired. The specie basis provided for in the act, even if it could be enforced, is a sham and delusion; and the day of its full execution should be celebrated as the beginning of the reign of "rag money." It has not the poor apology of a nominal specie basis, where a small percentage of coin reserve is held. And even this affords no adequate protection against fluctuations and suspensions of payment. Mr. Secretary McCulloch, in his annual report of 1865, while urging a return to a specie basis, was compelled to say:

It is admitted that on a coin basis there will be periods of expansion. Times of the greatest expansion and speculation in the United States have been, indeed, when the banks were nominally paying specie. This was the case prior to the revulsions of 1837 and 1857, the expansion of credits having in both instances preceded suspensions; but this does not militate against the theory just stated.

Again:

The financial crisis of 1857 was the result of a similar cause, namely, the unhealthy extension of the various forms of credit. * * * Now, in both these instances the expansions occurred while the business of the country was upon a specie basis, but it was only nominally so. A false system of credits had intervened, under which payments were deferred and specie as a measure of value and a regulator of trade was practically ignored.

The amount of paper circulation on the 1st of January, 1837, as appears by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of 1838, was $149,185,890, while the amount of specie in the banks was $37,915,340, or nearly 25 per cent. This, however, was not sufficient to either insure convertibility of the bills or promote a healthy state of business. Expansions of bank credits in the form of deposits and loans then reached dimensions comparatively as extravagant as those which we witnessed in the fall of 1873. In the latter year the banks failed to meet their obligations even in currency. In the one case there was a nominal specie basis, in the other a credit basis, and in both cases like suspensions of payment followed with like disasters. Where there is an actual coin dollar back of each paper dollar that floats in its stead, the paper dollar may be quite as stable as the coin, but when the law requires only a small fraction of coin or none at all to be held in reserve, there must oftentimes come fluctuations, disturbances, and suspension of payments. But it is no part of my purpose to go into a general discussion of the merits or demerits of specie payments. Opposition to this act does not imply opposition to the specie basis or friendly aid to a depreciated currency. All are in favor of appreciating our paper to par, and of maintaining it at that standard. What it does imply, and what I mean to distinctly assert, is that in the present abnormal condition of things, with the absence of gold in the country, with our large indebtedness at home and abroad, public and private, and with the existing depression of business, trade, and commerce, the specie basis cannot be reached, if at all, at the time nor in the mode and manner provided in this measure, without entailing general bankruptcy and ruin.

To meet the insuperable objections in the way of the enforcement of this act, its friends and advocates regale us by long dissertations upon the evils of "unlimited inflation." Is it true that unconditional repeal signifies this? Does it effect any increase of either the legal-tender or national-bank notes? By no manner of means. On the contrary, while it stops the contraction of the legal-tenders, it also stops the expansion of the national-bank notes. This is too plain to need elucidation to any intelligent mind. But while the repeal does not imply unlimited inflation, nor, indeed, any inflation at all, the enforcement of the act implies almost unlimited contraction. The issue made is contraction and non-contraction, not inflation and non-inflation.

As to the first eighty-two millions of legal-tenders to be retired so as to reduce the whole amount that remains outstanding to three hundred millions, there is to be issued national-bank notes in their stead, and thus far it results in no contraction, although it substitutes the one kind of currency for the other. But as to the remaining three hundred millions no such provision of law exists. There is no substitution of national-bank notes for that vast amount of legal-tenders: and not a tithe of the gold with which they are to be redeemed will remain to fill up the vacuum thus caused by their retirement. But the contraction does not stop here. The practical effect of the enforcement of the act will be to diminish also the volume of national-bank notes between now and the 1st of January, 1879, whatever may be the ultimate expansion of this class of currency. The national-bank notes are now redeemable in legal-tenders, and the banks will not stand by and see them retired, leaving on their hands the whole volume of their circulation to be taken care of by the hazard of future legislation or redemption in coin. While the legal-tenders may be used for redemption and before the 1st of January, 1879, the banks will surrender the major part of their circulation. This process has already begun in anticipation of enforcement. In one year from the time of the passage of the act the banks have retired and canceled $10,456,114 of their circulating notes, and have deposited in the Treasury $22,011,206 with which to redeem a like amount of their notes, making a practical contraction of their circulation of $32,467,320. In the same time there was a redemption of legal-tenders to the amount of $10,172,780, and of fractional currency $2,243,525, or a total practical contraction of $44,883,625. And as the time approaches for final redemption the process of contraction will be greatly accelerated. In less than three years' time there will result a direct contraction of three hundred millions of legal-tenders, and, as incidental to this, a further contraction of a large portion of the national-bank circulation, probably some two hundred millions or more. So great and sudden a withdrawal of the circulating medium must inevitably overwhelm the country in bankruptcy and ruin.

Congress in 1868 was compelled to repeal the act allowing a contraction to the amount of four millions per month, and the present Secretary of the Treasury does not deem it safe to suggest a funding of over two millions per month of the legal-tender notes; and yet we are asked to stand by this so-called specie-resumption act which forces a contraction in a little over two years and a half of five hundred millions or more. It is appalling to contemplate the dire results of its enforcement, and the people with one common voice are demanding its repeal. In obedience to that demand, and to the highest and best interests of the whole country, it is the duty of this Congress to expunge the act from the statutes.

TEXAS AND PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. CULBERSON. I propose to submit some remarks on the bill (H. R. No. 472) amendatory of and supplementary to the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, and the act supplementary thereto, approved May 2, 1872, and the act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific Ocean," approved July 27, 1866.

Mr. Chairman, believing that this bill to aid in the construction of the Texas and Pacific Railroad is one of the most important measures pending before this House, I desire to submit some observations and remarks upon it. Although this measure can in no sense be classed as a party measure or as one sectional in character, yet its magnitude and scope are such that both of the political parties seem indisposed to enter upon its consideration at the threshold of a great political canvass. Never perhaps since the formation of the Government has there been a presidential canvass in which will be enlisted a deeper feeling and a stronger desire for success on the part of each of the great political parties than that which will take place in November. The circumstances which surround both parties invest the struggle with great and peculiar interest, and it may not be wonderful that in preparing for the contest each party should desire to avoid all opportunity for criticism which usually presents itself upon the passage of any important measure, however well guarded the public interests may be. It is to be regretted that under influences like these a measure of vast importance both to the Government and people may yield to the exigencies of party and be allowed to repose in committee-rooms until the voice of the people shall call it forth.

This is not the only measure which may abide the coming election. Indications, unmistakable in character, clearly indicate that no great measure of remedial and reformatory legislation, nor measure of retrenchment of expenditures, except such as may be coerced through Congress by the aid of appropriation bills, will be allowed to become a law during this session. The hope may be indulged that when the smoke of the contest clears away and the fiat of the people is known we can address ourselves in earnestness to this the grandest measure now before the American people.

What is the proposition? The Texas and Pacific Railroad Company was chartered by an act of Congress in 1871, with authority to construct, own, and operate a railway line from Marshall, near the eastern border of Texas, to San Diego, on the Pacific Ocean, and with like authority to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburgh Railroad Company, chartered by the Legislature of Louisiana, to construct and operate a railway from New Orleans to the eastern terminus of the Texas and Pacific at the city of Marshall. The usual subsidies in lands were granted to these companies. Long before this legislation by Congress the State of Texas had chartered the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and the Memphis, El Paso and Pacific Company. The former was authorized to construct and operate a line of railway from the city of Marshall to El Paso, on the western border of Texas. The latter was authorized to construct and own a railway from Fulton, near the eastern border of Texas, to El Paso. Both of these companies were magnificently subsidized by the State. The land grants to these companies were the most valuable ever conferred by any authority in this country on works of internal improvements. Large belts of the most fertile lands of that fertile State were reserved from sale or location to meet the engagement of the State with these companies.

After the close of the war the Transcontinental Railway Company succeeded to the rights and franchises of the Memphis and El Paso Company. Shortly after the passage of the act of Congress incorporating the Texas and Pacific Railway Company, an act was passed by the Legislature of the State of Texas authorizing said company to acquire, own, and succeed to all the rights of the Texas companies before named. After a series of acts of the Legislature and conditional changes of the donations the Texas and Pacific Railway Company became possessed of all the rights of the companies named, and by a legislative adjustment of a controversy between the State and said company the subsidies settled and agreed upon consisted of twenty-four sections of land to the mile, and the Texas and Pacific Company undertook to comply with all the terms of the original grant. This act of adjustment required the construction of the road from Marshall to Texarkana, thence to Sherman, thence to Fort Worth, connecting at that point with the main line.

Since the acquisition of these chartered rights by the Texas and Pacific Railway Company the road has been completed from Marshall, say, to Forth Worth on the main line, and from Sherman to Paris on the transcontinental division of the road, aggregating about four hundred miles of completed road equipped and in successful operation. The proposition now is to extend the road from the city of Marshall to Vicksburgh; to preserve and secure a connection with New Orleans by a branch over an independent route from the city of Marshall; to provide a connection with Memphis by an independent line to Jefferson, Texas; to connect the coast cities of Texas with the main line by a branch to Waco, and also to abandon the charter of the Atlantic and Pacific road from Vinita to the ocean, and allow said company to unite with the Texas and Pacific at a point east of El Paso; and by the provisions of the bill and proposed amendments the road is to be completed within a time prescribed, including the unfinished sections of road between Paris and Texarkana and Sherman and Fort Worth. A glance over the map will show the magnitude of the enterprise and the vast section of our country to be benefited by the completion of the road and branches as proposed. The connections on the Mississippi River at Memphis and Vicksburgh with the railroad system of the Gulf and Atlantic States present a continuous southern highway across the continent, while western, northern, and eastern States, already checked with railroads, connect with the proposed lines under the most favorable circumstances.

THE AID DESIRED.

Mr. Chairman, several bills have been introduced at this session of Congress to aid in the construction of the Texas and Pacific Railway. The provisions of these bills are, in most respects, similar. The bill introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] is the most elaborate and carefully prepared measure on this subject before Congress, and it is understood that its provisions, in the main, are acceptable to the company and the advocates of the enterprise. With some amendments proposed, and not seriously opposed, the measure will present the greatest strength which can be gathered in support of this legislation. The provisions, object, and expediency of the measure have been presented to Congress and the country by the gentleman from Tennessee in an able and exhaustive speech, leaving those of us who follow but a small margin to explore.

As proposed by the bill referred to, the road is to be built in sections of ten miles. As each section is completed the company is authorized to present to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States its bonds at the rate of $35,000 per mile. The Secretary of the Treasury is required to place upon each of the bonds a guarantee obligating the Government of the United States to pay the interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum in case the company should fail to pay it in accordance with the terms of the bonds. These bonds of the company, with the interest thus guaranteed by the Government, are to be redelivered to the company for negotiation and sale upon the certificate of an officer of the Government that the section of ten miles is completed in accordance with the provisions of the law. The amount of interest per mile is not to exceed $1,750, and for each section of ten miles finished road the whole amount of interest liability thus incurred by the Government would amount to $17,500. If the entire road should be completed by sections, and the company should elect to present a bond for each mile, the whole amount of bonds authorized to be issued would not exceed $90,000,000, and consequently the whole amount of interest upon the entire issue for which the Government would be bound as a guarantor would be $4,500,000.

The security provided against loss.

First. The Government takes a mortgage on the road, its equipments, net earnings, and proceeds of the sale of the lands of the company.

Second. The sums which may become due to the company for transporting military supplies and service generally for the Military, Postal, and Indian Departments are to be retained by the Government and appropriated, if necessary, to the payment of the interest on the bonds.

Third. Five thousand dollars per mile or more, if the road costs less than the average specified, of the guaranteed bonds are to remain in the Treasury.

In addition to this apparently ample security to save the Government from possible loss, it is re-invested with the title to thirty millions of acres of land, which heretofore were granted by the Government to the Atlantic and Pacific Company, and which that company by the acceptance of the proposed legislation reconveys to the Government in consideration of the advantages which are to inure to that company from the junction of that road with the Texas and Pacific road, as before stated.

Sir, the value of these securities and their entire sufficiency, when contemplated along with the safeguards provided to insure the Government against all loss, cannot be questioned or doubted. It should be borne in mind that no bonds are to be delivered in advance of the completion of each section or installment of work. Thus it will be seen that no liability is assumed by the Government until the basis of a valid and undoubted security is presented in the shape of a finished section of ten miles of road. When the Government shall deliver to the company their bonds with the interest guaranteed for each mile of such completed section, it takes a mortgage upon the road, equipments, and net earnings, the proceeds of the sale of donated lands, sums due the company from the Government for service, and $5,000 of each bond in a certain contingency to indemnify it against loss. These securities are continuing, migratory, following along the work as it progresses, and continuing to increase in value as the road is extended.

What value, sir, ought to be attached to the securities which are thus tendered the Government to induce it to grant this aid? The land donation of Texas to this company or to those whose rights it possesses is estimated at nine millions of acres upon the uncompleted part of said road within the State. Patents are issued to the company by the State upon the completion of every section of ten miles—twenty-four sections per mile. The value of the Texas lands may be estimated with absolute safety at $2 per acre. The proceeds of the sale of these lands are required by the bill under consideration to be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and as the road progresses into the Territories beyond Texas a like disposition is to be made of the sale of the lands granted to the company heretofore by the Government, or so much thereof in either case as may be necessary to protect the Government from any loss by reason of its guarantee of interest.

I have said, sir, that the present value of the Texas lands may be placed at $2 per acre; but when the road shall have penetrated the country beyond the rising city of Fort Worth and the gaps between Paris and Texarkana, and Sherman and Fort Worth shall have been completed, the enhanced value of these lands will augment this security more than double. No fears, sir, should be entertained of the inability of the company to dispose of its lands at fair prices. Texas is to-day the most desirable State in the Union for investment in lands. Its area in square miles is 274,365, or 175,594,560 acres.

It is not an extravagant estimate to say that Texas has a larger body of virgin soil, never touched by the implements of husbandry, than all of the other Southern States combined, and beyond all question no State in the Union can boast of soil and climate better suited to the production of the chief agricultural products. Almost in any county in Texas wheat, corn, cotton, sugar-cane, rye, oats, and barley may be raised side by side in the same field, and this cannot be said of any other country. Population is pouring into the State over all the roads which enter it. Lands are increasing in value and will continue to do so. There will be no lack of demand for Texas lands.

Mr. Chairman, I come now to speak of the value of that part of the security which relates to the net earnings of the road. This is a subject of estimation and calculation purely. The road as now operated pays a fine profit, and this will increase as the road is extended. No one who has a knowledge of the country through which the road will pass can for a moment doubt that when completed it will be the best-paying road in the United States and that the net proceeds of its business will furnish a fund sufficient to pay not only the interest but provide an ample sinking-fund to pay the principal of the bonds. The line of the road spans an immense section of country now almost without railroad connections or facilities, and the dividend of its business cannot fail to be great. The genial and temperate climate of that section of the country in which the projected road is located, the freedom of the entire line from snow blockades and the perils of mountain ranges, the fertility of the soil and the variety of the productions along the whole extent of country traversed by this road, the immense demand of the Government for transportation, the vast interoceanic and way trade which must and will find their way over this route, all will unite to render the road when completed a paying investment. The Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroad Companies operate together twenty-two hundred and fifty miles of railway, and for the year 1875 report $6,500,000 clear net profit, after deducting interest on their bonds as well.

If such results follow the completion of the northern roads which pass through, for the greater way, a poor and sterile country, covered with snow and ice during whole seasons of the year, who can estimate the grand results which must await the completion of this grand enterprise along the thirty-second parallel?

Sir, the provision in this bill which authorizes the Government to retain and hold all sums due from it to the company for transportation of troops, military supplies, postal and other service, cannot fail to attract attention. It is a certain, direct, and most valuable indemnity against loss on the part of the Government by reason of the failure of the company to meet the interest on their bonds. The amount cannot be accurately stated, but may be approximated. From the best estimates at hand and in view of the amounts now paid by the Government for these objects, it will be safe to assume that the annual earnings of the company from this source will not fall short of two millions, a sum nearly sufficient to pay one-half the interest on the whole amount of bonds authorized to be issued by the company, in the event the entire road is completed. I do not deem it necessary to speak further of the value of the securities proposed. No one can, it seems to me, have any doubt upon this branch of the subject.

Mr. Chairman, the experience of government, national, State, and municipal, in extending aid to railroad companies has not been of that character which commends such legislation to the favor of the people. Various causes combined have set in motion throughout the country a strong current of popular disapprobation of such legislation. It is now only sufficient to kill or damn a measure, however meritorious, to ingraft upon it, by fair or foul means, the character of a subsidy.

Perhaps the chief reason which can be assigned for this settled and unreasoning opposition to aid to works of internal improvement which fall within that class permitted by the Constitution arises from the application and appropriation of large sums of public money or property to works of doubtful utility and partaking more of a private than public character. The means usually employed to convert the money or property of the people to private uses under the pretense of public uses have, in the main, been such as honest men denounce. Since the war the Southern States have had the saddest experience on this subject, and the people of that section have been called upon so often to witness the conversion of public property to private uses by corrupt legislation and infamous misappropriation that nothing which partakes of a subsidy can find favor with them. This feeling is not confined alone to the South. The whole country reels and staggers under the burden of debt largely created by gross injustice and infamous legislation, under the cloak of aiding works of internal improvement, without regard to results.

Much of the opposition to this bill has been created by assigning to it the character of a subsidy and instilling that belief into the minds of the people. The real objects of the measure have been studiously misrepresented, and its terms and provisions perverted and distorted until the public mind is about ready to conclude that it is an immense "legislative job" to convert the money of the people to the uses of a private corporation.

Corporations, which have grown rich and powerful upon unmixed Government subsidies, are arrayed in bitter and relentless antagonism to this enterprise. They have full knowledge of the deep and settled hatred of a large number of the people of this country to subsidies, for they have been carrying for years the curses of the people upon their rapacity and ill-gotten wealth from the public Treasury.

All the avenues which lead to correct understanding on the part of the people have been obstructed by the agents, officers, and attorneys of these opposing corporations, until perhaps not within the memory of the oldest member on this floor has there ever been a great public measure so misunderstood and perverted.

Mr. Chairman, in no just or true sense can it be said that the aid sought by this bill is a subsidy, or that it partakes of the nature thereof. How stand the facts? A railroad company, chartered by Congress in 1871, declared to be a public highway, a military and post-road, with a reservation of the right to Congress to control the charges thereof, authorized to own and operate a line of railway across the continent, constituting when completed a competing railway to the Pacific Ocean, a grand southern transcontinental road, has expended fourteen millions of money upon the work.

Private capital and credit have been exhausted in the vain effort to bring together the means necessary to complete the work within the time demanded by the exigencies of the Government and the wants of the people. The Government needs the road. The people require it. It is a national work; a grand national economy. The company simply proposes to the Government that if it will guarantee the interest upon their bonds in the manner stated, so as to enable the company to raise part of the money necessary to build the road, ample securities and collaterals against all loss will be placed by the company in the Treasury. There are no defects in the securities and no lack of safeguards. This is the proposition; nothing more, nothing less. If the security is defective or insufficient, and the Government should be required to pay the interest on the bonds, or any part thereof, without redress, then to that extent it might be said that the aid granted was a subsidy or a gratuity; but it would still fall outside of that character of subsidies and gratuities which have gone so far to shock the sense of justice of the people. Because if there were no security at all for the undertaking of the Government, or if the securities should prove inadequate or valueless and the Government should have to pay the whole amount of interest to accrue on the bonds, it could still be said that the enterprise was national and necessary, and within that class of cases permitted by the Constitution. But, on the other hand, if the security is ample and ultimate loss cannot occur, the transaction is simply an extension of credit upon full indemnity for a great national, constitutional object demanded by the highest interest of the Government and people.

Mr. Chairman, it is said by some that Congress has no power to grant aid to the construction of railways in any manner, shape, or form. If this be true, the measure under consideration ought to fail, as the evil which would flow from a violation of the Constitution could in no wise be justified by any real or supposed benefits which might inure to the people. If the Government of the United States has the right to build a road or canal in any case, it will hardly be disputed that it might constitutionally aid in the construction of such work. The greater includes the less, and a fragment of power may be rightfully exercised without a necessity to exhaust the entire grant. The proposition here is not to build the road, but to aid an association of capital to do so. If the Government is to have no interest in the road when completed, no authority or right to convert it to the uses of the public, then it might be truly said that the aid extended was an improper conversion of public means to private uses.

What is the character of the enterprise under consideration? The charter declares that the proposed line of railway shall be a military and post road. The right to regulate the charges for transportation, not only for the Government but for the trade, commerce, and travel of the people as well, is reserved to Congress. It will be seen, therefore, that the Government, for all time, would have an interest in this road, secured by such aid as is here asked. That interest would be most valuable, necessary, and proper, and the aid extended to secure it would not be conversion of Government aid to private uses, but for a necessary public use. If the Government can construct a military and post road which is demanded by public necessity, surely it might aid in the construction of such road, reserving the right always to subject it to public uses as might be deemed necessary and just. The purpose of granting this power to Congress was to enable the Government to provide itself with those facilities and necessary faculties to carry on and administer the affairs of the nation safely and economically. If this purpose can be attained by a partial exercise of the power vested in Congress no one should insist that the act was unauthorized.

The precedents and uniform practice of the Government, the declarations and opinions of the leading participants in the formation of the Constitution, and opinions of the ablest expounders of that instrument, together with unbroken and uniform party declarations, all sustain fully the authority of Congress to build military and post roads.

I feel that I will be justified in taxing the House with a reference to the opinions of a few only of those whom the country delighted to honor while living and whose memories a greatful people have embalmed. Mr. Monroe, in a special message to Congress on internal improvements, says:

> My idea is that Congress has an unlimited power to raise money, and that in its application they have the discretionary power, restricted only by the duty to appropriate it to purposes of common defense and of general, not local, national, not State, benefit.

In his message to Congress in 1824 he fully indorsed the legislation of Congress which required the President to cause to be surveyed such roads and canals as "he might deem of national importance in a commercial or military point of view or for the transportation of the mails." In the same message he advocated the construction of a route from Washington City to New Orleans.

Mr. Calhoun, who is regarded throughout the Southern States at least as good authority on the proper construction of limitations on the power of Congress, was Secretary of War under President Monroe, and in his report in 1824 in regard to the surveys referred to held this language:

> In projecting the surveys the whole Union must be considered as one, and the attention, not to these roads and canals, which may facilitate intercourse between parts of the same State, but to those which may bind all the parts together and the whole with the center, thereby facilitating commerce and intercourse among the States and enabling the Government to disseminate promptly through the mails information to every part and to extend protection to the whole. By doing this the General Government will afford (practically to those States situated in the interior) the only means of perfecting improvements of a similar description which properly belongs to them.

In 1817 a special committee of the House of Representatives was appointed to take into consideration the question of the power of Congress over this subject. I quote from a report made by that committee the following:

> Congress has the power—
> First. To lay out, improve, and construct post-roads through the several States, with assent of respective States.
> Second. To open, construct, and improve military roads through the several States, with the assent of the States.
> Third. To cut canals through the States, with their assent, for promoting and giving internal security to internal commerce or for the more safe and economical transportation of military stores in time of war, leaving in all cases the jurisdictional right over the soil to the respective States.

This report meets the questions involved in the measure under consideration fully. It was sustained by Mr. Tucker and Mr. Clay and adopted by Congress.

Neither Mr. Jefferson nor Mr. Madison ever entertained a doubt of the power of Congress in the premises set forth in the foregoing report, and it is well known that Benton, Webster, Cass, and Douglas sustained the doctrine announced by Mr. Calhoun in his report which I have before referred to.

In 1827 President John Quincy Adams approved the law of Congress donating to the State of Indiana 1,439,279 acres of land in aid of the Wabash and Erie Canal. President Taylor in 1850 approved a grant of 2,595,053 acres of land to the State of Illinois in aid of the Illinois Central Railroad.

The law of Congress passed in 1862 granted the Union and Central Pacific Railroad $65,000,000 in bonds and 35,000,000 acres of land.

The Supreme Court of the United States has expressly affirmed the power of Congress to pass that act in a recent decision.

Mr. Chairman, the official records show that under this power Congress has appropriated and expended in money, without reference to lands, between 1788 and 1873, $104,705,163.43 for railroads, wagon-roads, and canals, all of which mainly have been expended outside the Southern States. It would seem, therefore, that it is too well settled now that Congress has the power claimed to question it. This power was granted for great and national purposes, and ought not to be prejudiced or confounded with assumed powers by State Legislatures in many instances and municipal government in others. The decisions of the courts in such cases, usually, strongly denounce the exercise of such power and have justified the people in their indignant denunciation of the attempted exercise of such power.

There can be no doubt but that the "national power" has been unpopularized by unwise exercise of it and by the assumption of powers by State Legislatures. I am free to confess that this power was never intended to check the country with railroads and canals for the benefit of individuals, corporations, or States, and the exercise of it without regard always to the national, general purpose to be attained would be a perversion and abuse of authority.

On the other hand, when the necessities of the Government and the promotion of its welfare unite with the highest interests of the whole country in demanding the exercise of this power, it is the plain duty of Congress to go forward and exercise it, always with proper economy and safeguards to protect the Government from improper advantages, which associations and individuals too often seek and sometimes secure.

Mr. Chairman, I do not understand that this power should be exercised only in hard times, seasons of stringency, when domestic distress covers the land, and thousands are without employment and the means to procure their daily bread; but, sir, it is true that when floods sweep fields, farms, and homes away, leaving whole sections of country destitute of the means of living; when the ravages of war have destroyed the substance of neighborhoods and even States; when famine or pestilence, either at home or abroad, strikes down the strong arms of those who toil for dependent families, Government has not been appealed to in vain to open the garners of its wealth in order to alleviate the sufferings and misfortunes of those whom private charity could not assist.

It might well be asked if there be any difference on principle between such cases and that which now unhappily presents itself to the view of the American people. Throughout large sections of the country want, suffering, and destitution exist. The cry is for work; the demand for labor is too small. The great industries of the country are paralyzed. The fires have burned to ashes in the furnaces of factories, founderies, and mills. The spade and shovel are silent along great lines of work which gave labor to thousands and bread to many more. The bone and sinew of the country, outside of agricultural districts, are without employment, and States, cities, and towns are appealed to for work for the unemployed that starvation may be averted. It may be said that the Government cannot afford to furnish shelter and work for those who may be homeless, and who may be willing to work rather than steal or starve; but it is submitted that the occasion for the commencement of this work under the auspices of the Government is most opportune and fortunate. And if the reasons which present themselves to the Government are sufficient to induce the extension of the aid desired, it would seem that a more auspicious time could not have fallen upon us to secure the completion of this great enterprise.

Sir, the continuance of this great enterprise under the plan proposed by this bill will give life and activity to all of our great industries from the furnace to the plow. Indeed, when we contemplate the results which must flow to the Government and the people from the prosecution and completion of this work, we can but stand amazed and overcome at the prospect of the blessings they will bestow. Why either of the great political parties should pause at the threshold of this legislation until the election is over, finds no answer, except it be in the fact that time is needed to uncover the great measure from the misrepresentations and perversions with which interested monopolies have environed it.

Are the reasons for undertaking it sufficient? The immense cost of the transportation of troops, military supplies, and telegraphic communication, now incurred annually by the Government, will be largely reduced by the completion of this road. The Indian and Mexican troubles are both to the General Government and Texas a serious problem. Texas has been compelled to pay from her treasury nearly two millions of money to provide that defense to her border which the Government was bound by the terms of annexation, by the law of the land, and by every national obligation to furnish, yet failed to do. At an annual expense of a half million of money she is compelled to keep soldiers in the field to repel the inroads of Mexicans and Indians.

It will not be said that the expenditure of this money is unnecessary when the facts are known and properly appreciated. Raids projected from Mexico, not irregular in character and of occasional occurrence, but partaking of the nature of regular organizations, set on foot for the deliberate purpose of plunder and murder, have well-nigh destroyed the property of a large section of the country, and unless they are repressed the most serious results must follow. Speaking for Texas, I declare that she desires no war with Mexicans or Indians, but she does desire repose, tranquillity, and freedom from invasion. The bold and manly conduct of her State authorities and the moderation and respect for national relations which have characterized the administration of her State government in this behalf for the last two years challenge the admiration of the whole country; and to-day, while the murderous Indians, fed and clothed by the Government, build their camp-fires in her settlements, as they have done for years, and organized bands of Mexicans lay waste and plunder her border, no violation of international law, nor insubordination to the regulations and commands of national authority, can be imputed to her. She has borne this deep and terrible wrong not without murmuring at the injustice of the Government, but with that firmness and endurance which have ever characterized her people. Instead of rising in her strength, as she might have done, and sweeping from the face of the earth that "robber population" which shelters itself under the flag of another nation, instead of passing within the lines of Indian reservations to punish the murderers of her citizens and recapture property stolen from her people, she has respected the orders of national authority, and maintained a defensive position; and she is here to-day demanding protection at once and offering counsel, advice, and influence in aid of the completion of that great work upon which she has lavished millions of dollars, and which, when completed, will render the state of affairs which now exists upon her border forever afterward impossible.

Mr. Chairman, although the military force disposable for service on the Rio Grande is insufficient to render adequate protection, as stated by the President in his message, still in Texas, New Mexico, and California the military branch of the Government costs annually fifteen millions of money. The completion of this work will furnish a solution to the serious problem which confronts us in the West, and save the Government annually in the cost of the military and postal service more than the interest on the entire amount of bonds which this company is authorized to issue. The completion of this road will develop in the far West immense mineral wealth, and will hasten the day and time so devoutly wished for when specie may be substituted for paper money without producing convulsions in business or the destruction of private fortunes. The spirit of trade and commerce, so long repressed in Mexico, will be aroused and vitalized. Her mountains and cañons, rich in ores, will be made to surrender up their wealth to the wants of mankind. Vast sections of country, rich in valleys, mountains, and streams, which now rest in unbroken solitude, unprofitable to the owner and to the Government, will become the happy home of industrious millions, and render a large revenue to the Government. The wants and necessities of the Government, without reference to those of the people, cannot be supplied by the facilities which are now furnished by the completed road to the Pacific, and the existence of that road is no argument against the necessity of another road to the ocean. The country where mostly the operations of the Government demand facilities of transportation of troops and postal accommodations lies along the thirty-second parallel, a region entirely beyond the reach of the present completed road.

Our experience clearly demonstrates that one transcontinental line is wholly insufficient to meet the wants of the Government, the trade and commerce of the country. If that line lay along a temperate latitude, and was controlled in the spirit of a generous and liberal corporation, it would still be insufficient to meet the demands for interocean traffic, commerce, and communication. How much more is a competing road demanded when the company operating the present line conduct it in the spirit of extortion and arbitrary gain? The failure of Congress to compel these companies to conform their charges to rates to be prescribed by law places it in their power to lay such tariffs upon trade and travel as cupidity may suggest and freedom from competition justify. They have not been slow or conscientious in availing themselves of this right. The savings, annually, in the cost of transportation to the Government and people which would result from a competing road would be more than sufficient to pay the interest on the entire amount of bonds to be issued under the provisions of this bill. These companies well understand this matter, and accordingly, when a proposition is presented to construct a competing road, we find them flooding Congress with arguments and protests against it, and invoking to their aid, in opposition, misrepresentation and perversion of the objects and terms of the proposition. They have no gratitude for the Government whose munificence and subsidies helped them to that power which wealth brings, and no mercy for the people who annually bear the burden of a grievous tax to pay the interest upon the bonds donated.

Mr. Chairman, it is said by some that too much consideration has been shown to Texas in the provisions of this bill in regard to branches from the main line, and this is made an objection to it. In regard to this objection I desire to say something. The branch from Marshall to New Orleans rests upon the highest grounds. It cannot be interfered with, except so far as to indicate a different company to own and operate the line if deemed necessary, without violating public faith and private contract based on a valuable consideration. A connection between New Orleans and Marshall, the eastern terminus of the road, was provided for in the charter of the Texas and Pacific Company when Texas gave her assent by a legislative enactment to the acquisition of the franchises and rights of the two companies before referred to. This provision contributed largely to the passage of the act, and may truly be said to have entered into and become a part of the consideration of the act of the Legislature. Besides this, the people of Harrison County have donated to this company $400,000 in bonds and property in part consideration of the maintenance of the proposed connections at the city of Marshall. I repeat, therefore, that to disturb this connection would be a violation of good faith and private contract. The branch from Jefferson, in Texas, to Memphis is demanded by interests which cannot be overlooked. They are not confined to Texas, but are national. It secures to New York the shortest route to the commercial emporium of the Southwest, Galveston. Texas might well demand as much, but the North itself cannot consent that this branch should be omitted. Besides, it furnishes at Memphis a connection with the railway system of the Atlantic States, and by that means presents a connected railway system from Norfolk to the Pacific Ocean.

Time will not allow me to enter upon a review of the benefits which are to flow from these connections. Only one branch purely Texan is provided for by this bill and proposed amendments. I allude to that one which proposes to connect the main line with the Texas Gulf by forming a connection with the Texas Central Railroad at Waco, so earnestly and justly urged before the committee by my colleagues, [Mr. MILLS and Mr. THROCKMORTON.] This is due to Texas, and a just appreciation of her efforts and donations to secure the completion of this great highway will remove all objection to this branch. The completion of this road on a basis such as proposed by the bill introduced by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] the provisions of which have been so ably and elaborately set forth by him in his speech before the House, would tend to equalize the advantages and benefits which flow from the aid of the Government to works of internal improvement. Under the laws of 1862 and 1864 the Government has issued in aid of the construction of railroads $64,000,000 in bonds drawing 6 per cent. interest and payable in thirty years. Those bonds were donated as follows:

To Union Pacific	$27,236,512
Central Pacific	25,885,120
Kansas Pacific	6,303,000
Central Branch Union Pacific	1,500,000
Western Pacific	1,970,500
Sioux City and Pacific	1,628,000

I omit all reference to land donations.

I do not claim, Mr. Chairman, that because the Government made an absolute donation of this large amount of money to aid in the construction of the roads named that therefore similar aid, or even such aid as is asked for this enterprise, should be granted in order simply to equalize the bounty of the Government. But the point presented is, that if the necessities of the Government and the people demand another highway to the Pacific Ocean, then the aid of the Government should be placed with due regard to donations heretofore made, and should be applied to that section of the country which has escaped the benefits which spring from the application of Government aid. It is fortunate that the necessities of the Government service indicate the proper line of this highway to be along the thirty-second parallel. If the aid of the Government is extended, the benefits of its application, directly, will reach that section of the country extending from Virginia to the Pacific Ocean, which heretofore has been practically excluded from participation in the benefits of Government aid to railroads, while indirectly and to a large extent all sections of the Union, by favorable connection with the main line, will be benefited. The Government, therefore, in extending the aid sought, will meet the requirements of the national service, and will be enabled at the same time to equalize its blessings, to some extent, to the whole country.

In order to show the relative appropriations of the Government heretofore, I call attention to the following table:

This table tells in unmistakable language where, heretofore, the bounty and patronage of the Government have fallen. An inquiry into the cause of the discrimination in favor of sections would be unprofitable, but may we not trust, Mr. Chairman, that the cause has been removed and that in the future there may be no reason to urge against a fair and equal distribution of such benefits as the Government may dispense in the exercise of its proper powers? Mr. Chairman, it should be remembered that a wide difference exists between the aid proposed by this bill and that which was extended to the railroads before mentioned. This proposition does not involve a bounty, subsidy, gift, or gratuity, nor even a voluntary indorsement from the Government. The proposition here is simply a guarantee of interest upon unquestioned security and to be extended only under such safeguards as will secure the Government against loss. It is a business transaction. The Government needs the road, the people need it, and this company, owning a charter over the route desired, proposes to build it on the conditions named.

A glance over the map will show, sir, that the construction of the roads to which the Government has donated sixty-four millions of money cannot advance the interest of the Gulf and Atlantic States beyond a common interest of all the States in the national objects attained. The great Northwest and East have been the recipients of the vast benefits which have followed the investment of this money in railways. New York, Chicago, and Boston are the great commercial centers to which the trade over these roads is directed, while the Northwest, in the rapid development of those resources which tend to increase the wealth and power of States and Territories, in the enjoyment of the facilities of transportation and communication, in the realization of advantages beyond the reach of private capital and credit, shows the influence, power, and advantage derived from the aid of the Government.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, the completion of this road will redeem the South from the thralldom of poverty. I enter no plea in behalf of her blighted fields, her destroyed industries, desolated homes, and broken fortunes. There they are; behold them for yourselves. She is not what she once was. True, we have the same genial sun, the same fertile fields and lovely valleys, the same lovely women, and some of the same true, generous men; the balance, with your gallant dead, have spread their tents "on fame's eternal camping-ground," and there may they rest in peace. But all else is changed. Our resources are unexhausted and inexhaustible, but they lie dormant and inactive, while her industries languish for the want of means to arouse and vitalize them. The war closed, and peace found us broken in fortune and without much hope for the future. The energy of her people has been severely taxed, but the waste places are being built up and the bruises on her limbs are healing. Her people are striving together to restore it to its former agricultural beauty and power. Politics and partisan spirit have delayed the work of restoration, but feuds and schisms of race, unhappily thrown among us, have passed away. From one end of that section to the other there are no bread riots, and, while all as a general rule are poor, starvation is unknown. Over all these hangs the blight of offended power and a feeling of constraint broods over the land.

No enterprise, no token of national kindness, no emblem of sectional reconciliation, could do more to rehabilitate the South and arouse her paralyzed industries than the adoption of this measure and the completion of this grand work. It would be an earnest from the heart and power of the nation that whatever of the past should be is forgotten, and that in fact, as in theory, we are a brotherhood of States, and that whatever of prosperity, glory, and renown may come to us in the future, the same shall be the common property of all.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to address the House briefly upon the subject of the Geneva award. I ask first for the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be the duty of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims in the mode and subject to all the conditions, limitations, and provisions of chapter 459 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress, except as changed or modified by this act, to receive and examine the claims mentioned in section 2 of this act, and to enter judgments for the amounts allowed therefor in three classes.

SEC. 2. That the first class shall be for claims directly resulting from damage done on the high seas by confederate cruisers during the late rebellion, including vessels and cargoes attacked on the high seas or pursued therefrom, although destroyed within four miles of the shore, except as provided for in section 11 of said chapter 459. The second class shall be claims for the payment of premiums for war risks, whether paid to corporations, agents, or individuals, after the sailing of any confederate cruiser. The third class shall be for claims for sums actually paid for insured property destroyed on the high seas by such confederate cruisers, except claims for which judgments have been entered under section 12 of said chapter.

SEC. 3. That in examining claims in the second class it shall be the duty of the court to deduct any sum in any way received by or repaid to the claimant, diminishing the amount paid for any such premium, so that the actual loss of the claimant only shall be allowed; and no claimant in the second class who has been paid such loss shall be entitled to receive from any insurance company recovering in the third class any further sum on account of such loss.

SEC. 4. That the judgments rendered by said court under this act shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury out of the sum of money paid to the United States pursuant to article 7 of the treaty of Washington, and accruing therefrom, not appropriated to claims provable under the provisions of said chapter 459 and the act extending the time for the filing of claims thereunder.

SEC. 5. That judgments entered in the first class shall be paid before judgments of the second class are paid and judgments of the second class shall be paid before judgments of the third class are paid. If the sum of money so unappropriated shall be insufficient to pay the judgments of the first class, they shall be paid according to the proportions which they severally bear to the whole amount of such unappropriated sum. If such sum shall be sufficient to pay the judgments of the first class and not sufficient to pay the judgments of the second class, the latter judgments shall be paid according to the proportions which they severally bear to the residue of such unappropriated sum. If such sum shall be sufficient to pay the judgments of the first and second classes and not sufficient to pay the judgments of the third class, they shall be paid according to the proportions which they severally bear to the residue of such unappropriated sum after the payment of the judgments of the first and second classes.

SEC. 6. That in other respects the said judgments shall be reported and paid in the mode provided for the payment of judgments by said chapter 459 and the act providing for the payment of judgments rendered and to be rendered thereunder.

SEC. 7. That all claims filed or that may hereafter be filed in said court in the name of one or more claimants, relating to a vessel in which other claimants are interested, shall be deemed and held to be legally filed the same as if all the parties in interest had joined in the filing of the petition.

Mr. LAWRENCE. When the bill comes before the House, I shall offer amendments, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the provisions relating to insurance companies, as follows:

1. Strike out all of section 1 after the word "cruiser" in line 9.

2. Strike out of section 5, lines 2 to 4, the words "and judgments of the second class shall be paid before judgments of the third class are paid."

3. Strike out all of section 5 after the word "sum" in line 12.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Then I shall offer as additional sections to the bill what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That it shall be the duty of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims to ascertain what vessels owned or chartered and paid for by the United States and what cargoes or other property owned by the United States were destroyed by the confederate cruisers inculpated by the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva, and the value of all such vessels and cargoes.

And the amount so ascertained, with interest, as in cases of judgments rendered by said court, shall by said court be certified to the Secretary of the Treasury, and there shall be covered into the Treasury from the money awarded to the United States by said tribunal of arbitration at Geneva a sum equal to the amount so certified.

It shall be the duty of said court to ascertain—

1. The value of vessels and cargoes of citizens of the United States destroyed by said inculpated cruisers which were insured in and losses for the same paid by foreign underwriters.

2. The difference between the interest covered by said award and that paid by the United States to claimants in whose favor judgments have been rendered, being 2 per cent. on the value from the time of the damage done by said cruisers until payment.

3. The difference between the interest arising from the investment of said award in bonds of the United States and that paid to claimants under findings and judgments of said court, to the extent of the payments.

4. The difference in value between the money received under said award and of that with which judgments of said court were paid, being the difference between gold coin and United States notes.

And said court shall certify said several amounts to the Secretary of the Treasury, and there shall be covered into the Treasury, from proceeds of said award, a sum equal to said gross amount.

And all sums so certified shall be covered into the Treasury before any other claims or judgments shall be paid under this act, together with all costs and expenses arising under this act, to be ascertained and certified by said court as aforesaid.

That said court in examining claims of the first class mentioned in this act shall include all vessels, cargoes, and property owned or chartered and paid for by the United States.

And it shall be the duty of counsel on behalf of the United States to present and make proof in such cases to said court.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I shall then offer what I send to the Clerk's desk, as a substitute for the entire bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all bonds of the United States in which the money awarded to the United States by the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva has been invested, after paying all charges thereon and judgments as determined by the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, under existing law, shall be canceled by the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury, and all money, if any, arising from said award or from bonds in which it has been invested shall be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, during the recent rebellion in the United States three ships of war known as the Alabama, the Florida, and the Shenandoah were built in Great Britain, and permitted to go to sea, when they became confederate cruisers, destroying ships and commerce of the Government and citizens of the United States to the value probably of $15,500,000 in gold coin. During the progress of the construction of the Alabama and the Florida in England the proper authorities of Great Britain were notified by the minister of the United States, and well knew that these ships were being constructed as confederate cruisers to prey upon American commerce; but the British government, in violation of neutral duties, omitted to take any effective measures to prevent them from going to sea, and subsequently, in violation of international law, freely admitted them into the ports of colonies of Great Britain, instead of proceeding against them as duty required. The Alabama had a tender, the Tuscaloosa; and the Florida had tenders, the Clarence, the Tacony, and the Archer, to aid in the work of destruction.

The Shenandoah departed from London as a merchant-vessel prior to December, 1864, but was transformed soon after into a confederate cruiser near the island of Madeira, when she passed into Hobson's Bay; and British officials, with a knowledge of her purpose, permitted her, in violation of neutral duties, to depart from Melbourne on her hostile mission on the 18th of February, 1865.

On the 29th of December, 1864, the Shenandoah, before she had passed into Hobson's Bay, destroyed the ship Delphine, owned by citizens of the United States and sailing under our flag. It may be conceded, as it has been decided by the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva, that the British government was not responsible for the outrages of the Shenandoah prior to her departure from Melbourne. There were other confederate cruisers—the Georgia, the Tallahassee, the Chickamauga—fitted out within British jurisdiction, and some others elsewhere built, like the Sumter and Nashville, which used British waters as a base of hostile operations, all of which destroyed ships and cargoes of citizens of the United States. But as to these it may be conceded, as it has been decided, that the British government is exculpated from all responsibility, not having failed by any act or omission to fulfill any neutral duty.

The Florida and Alabama, and the Shenandoah after her departure from Melbourne, are commonly called "inculpated cruisers," because as to them the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva, in their award of September 14, 1872, decided that the British government was in fault in permitting them to sail from her ports on a hostile mission.

The other confederate cruisers to which I have referred are commonly called "exculpated," because as to them the Geneva tribunal decided that the British government was not in fault. As a mere question of criticism, it might be more proper to say that the British government itself was inculpated as to the so-called inculpated cruisers and exculpated as to the so-called exculpated cruisers.

During the war, citizens of the United States owning ships and cargoes on the ocean took out policies of insurance in insurance companies incorporated in the United States not only against ordinary marine risks, but also against loss from confederate cruisers, and for this insurance they paid "war premiums"—premiums increased in amount in consequence of the perils of war. Many vessels and cargoes insured were destroyed by the inculpated cruisers, while others of the insured class escaped uninjured. The result was that, although the insurance companies paid to the owners of ships and cargoes so insured and destroyed by confederate cruisers large sums of money, and in those particular cases suffered loss, yet very generally as to each company "the sum of its losses in respect to its war risks exceeded the sum of premiums or other gains upon or in respect to such war risks." Thus in fact, it may be said generally, each company on its whole war-risk insurance during the rebellion made large profits.

These insurance companies were of two classes: those known as "stock companies" and "mutual companies."

Those who were then members of the mutual companies of course are not now such, and if these companies could now be re-imbursed for losses during the rebellion the money paid them would go to the benefit of those who are now members and in no way connected with the original loss.

The stockholders in the cash companies have, as a general rule, doubtless changed so that if the companies are now re-imbursed for specific losses the profit will inure mainly to those who suffered nothing from the original loss.

As to them it will be a "wind-fall"—a naked gratuity.

During and immediately after the war claims against Great Britain were "filed in the Department of State by American citizens, native and naturalized, for damages sustained by them as owners, mariners, freighters, or insurers of duly-documented American ships captured and destroyed or appropriated by the officers and crew of the steamer Alabama, (and other confederate cruisers,) and, as owners, insurers, or otherwise, interested in the cargoes of such ships or in charter-parties for the service of said ships."

Many of these as they accrued during the war, and subsequently on the 27th of August, 1866, were presented by our Government to that of Great Britain for payment.

The treaty of Washington of May 8, 1871, between the United States and Great Britain resulted from these claims and other controverted questions between the two governments during and since the war. The first article provided that—

Claims growing out of acts committed by said vessels, and generically known as the "Alabama claims," should be referred to a tribunal of arbitration, to be composed of five arbitrators, to be appointed in the manner therein prescribed, who according to the terms of the next succeeding article were to meet at Geneva, Switzerland, at the earliest convenient day after their appointment, and proceed impartially and carefully to examine and decide all questions laid before them by the two governments respectively.

This article is preceded by a preamble which recites that—

Differences have arisen between the Government of the United States and the government of Her Britannic Majesty, * * * growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generically known as the "Alabama claims."

And it is further declared that the purpose of the treaty is—

To remove and adjust all complaints and claims on the part of the United States, and to provide for the speedy settlement of such claims.

The damages resulting from the destruction of American ships by British-built confederate cruisers were generally known as direct damages.

But the United States and our citizens sustained indirect damages resulting from the operations of the British-built confederate cruisers.

It was represented to the joint high commission which framed the treaty of Washington—

That the people and Government of the United States felt that they had sustained a great wrong * * * by the course and conduct of Great Britain.

And it was proposed that such commission—should agree upon a sum to be paid by Great Britain to the United States in satisfaction of all the claims. (See papers relating to the treaty of Washington, volume 1, pages 9 and 10.)

In the treaty itself nothing was said in express and decisive terms either of—

1. Damages to be paid the United States on account of the hasty recognition by the British government of the so-called confederate government as a "belligerent" power; nor

2. Of damages resulting from the transfer of a large part of the American commercial marine to the British flag, by reason of the British-built confederate cruisers; nor

3. Of the loss by reason of enhanced rates of insurance, popularly known as "war premiums;" nor

4. Of the loss to the United States for pursuing the British-built confederate cruisers, nor of the cost arising from prolonged war.

These were all indirect damages except the cost of the pursuit of the confederate cruisers.

When the tribunal of arbitration met at Geneva the claims presented to it were stated in the "American case," or "Argument of the United States," to be:

Losses growing out of the acts of cruisers of the confederates designated by the typical name of the Alabama. (Volume 3 of papers, page 209.)

The direct claims were fully presented. The claim for precipitate recognition of confederate belligerency was not presented. The Government undoubtedly—abandoned its claim for compensation founded upon the Queen's proclamation. (Papers, &c., volume 3, pages 106–203, 204–205; Report Judiciary Committee House of Representatives, Forty-third Congress, page 7.)

The other claims for indirect damages were presented to the tribunal. Our Government among other things said to the tribunal:

Should the tribunal find Great Britain responsible for the injuries caused by the acts of the cruisers, it cannot be denied that the war risk was the result of their dispatch from British ports. (Papers, volume 1, page 188.)

This "war-premium" damage was thus one of the five classes of claims presented by our Government.

The result is well known. The demand for indirect damages covering three of the five classes of claims presented threatened to defeat the whole arbitration. An attempt was made to negotiate an additional article to the treaty to determine the question of indirect damages, but this failed.

Finally the tribunal cut the controversy short by announcing:

That after the most careful perusal of all that has been urged on the part of the Government of the United States in respect of these claims, they have arrived, individually and collectively, at the conclusion that these claims do not constitute, upon the principles of international law applicable to such cases, good foundation for an award of compensation, or computation of damages between nations, and should upon such principles be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal in making its award, even if there was no disagreement between the two governments as to the competency of the tribunal to decide thereon.

The agent of the United States, after receiving the instructions of our Government, thereupon made to the tribunal the following statement:

The declaration made by the tribunal, individually and collectively, respecting the claims presented by the United States for the award of the tribunal, for, first, the losses in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag; second, the enhanced payments of insurance; and, third, the prolongation of the war, and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war, and the suppression of the rebellion, is accepted by the President of the United States as determinative of their judgment upon the important question of public law involved. The agent of the United States is authorized to say that, consequently, the above-mentioned claims will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, and may be excluded from all consideration in any award that may be made.

This left for the determination of the tribunal only two questions, one relating to the cost of pursuing the British-built confederate cruisers, and the other as to direct damages for ships and cargoes destroyed by them.

The award was made September 14, 1872, at Geneva. As to the cost of pursuing the cruisers, the award was as follows:

Whereas, so far as relates to the particulars of the indemnity claimed by the United States, the costs of pursuit of the confederate cruisers are not, in the judgment of the tribunal, properly distinguishable from the general expenses of the war carried on by the United States, the tribunal is therefore of opinion, by a majority of three voices to two, that there is no ground for awarding to the United States any sum by way of indemnity under this head.

The "Alabama claims" preferred against Great Britain for ships and cargoes destroyed included those made by the owners and the underwriters, sometimes both making claim for the same loss. But the claim of the underwriters was rejected by the tribunal, and the damages to ships and cargoes taken as the basis of an award. The award of the tribunal of arbitration as to these says:

And whereas in order to arrive at an equitable compensation for the damages which have been sustained it is necessary to set aside all double claims for the same losses; * * * and whereas in accordance with the letter and spirit of the treaty of Washington it is preferable to adopt the form of adjudication of a sum in grossrather than to refer the subject of compensation for further deliberation to a board of assessors as provided by article 10 of said treaty:

The tribunal, making use of the authority conferred upon it by article 7 of the said treaty * * * awards to the United States a sum of $15,500,000 in gold as the indemnity to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for the satisfaction of all the claims referred to the consideration of the tribunal conformably to the provisions contained in article 7 of the aforesaid treaty.

This award was paid to the United States September 9, 1873. The act of Congress of June 23, 1874, created the "court of commissioners of Alabama claims," and made it the duty of the court—

To receive and examine all claims directly resulting from damage caused by the so-called insurgent cruisers Alabama, Florida, and their tenders * * * and the Shenandoah after her departure from Melbourne on the 18th of February, 1865.

Then section 12 prescribes and limits the character of claimants, as follows:

That no claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court for any loss or damage for or in respect to which the party injured, his assignees or legal representatives, shall have received compensation or indemnity from any insurance company, insurer, or otherwise; but, if such compensation or indemnity so received shall not have been equal to the loss or damage so actually suffered, allowance may be made for the difference. And in no case shall any claim be admitted or allowed for or in respect to unearned freights, gross freights, prospective profits, freights, gains, or advantages, or for wages of officers or seamen for a longer time than one year next after the breaking up of a voyage by the acts aforesaid. And no claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court by or in behalf of any insurance company or insurer, either in its or his own right, or as assignee, or otherwise, in the right of a person or party insured as aforesaid, unless such claimant shall show, to the satisfaction of said court, that during the late rebellion the sum of its or his losses, in respect to its or his war risks, exceeded the sum of its or his premiums or other gains upon or in respect to such war risks; and in case of any such allowance, the same shall not be greater than such excess of loss. And no claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court arising in favor of any insurance company not lawfully existing at the time of the loss under the laws of some one of the United States. And no claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court arising in favor of any person not entitled at the time of his loss to the protection of the United States in the premises, nor arising in favor of any person who did not at all times during the late rebellion bear true allegiance to the United States.

The judgments under this act will consume about one-half of the fund, leaving nearly $10,000,000 to be disposed of.

The report of the Judiciary Committee made to the House on the 29th of March very properly states that—

Four classes of claimants for such unappropriated moneys have appeared before the committee:

First. Persons who had vessels destroyed during the late rebellion by the cruisers exculpated by such tribunal.

Second. Persons who paid war premiums by reason of such cruisers being upon the sea.

Third. Insurance companies who insured vessels destroyed by the cruisers inculpated by the tribunal of arbitration.

Fourth. Persons excluded by section 12 of chapter 459 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress, (act of June 23, 1874,) because not bearing, during the late rebellion, true allegiance to the United States.

The first and second classes are not within the provisions of said chapter 459.

The third class is within the provisions of said chapter, but the underwriters complain that by section 12 they are unjustly limited as to the amount of recovery.

The fourth class is excluded by section 12.

The third class demands the repeal of that part of section 12 which enacts, "No claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court by or in behalf of any insurance company * * * unless such claimant shall show to the satisfaction of said court that during the late rebellion the sum of its * * * losses in respect to its * * * war risks exceeded the sum of its * * * premiums or other gains upon or in respect to such war risks," and the fourth class demands the repeal of that part of said section by which they are excluded.

The report of the Judiciary Committee estimates the claims of the first class, including interest, at $1,500,000; the claims of the second class, at $5,000,000. The claims of the underwriters now asking payment, each $8,000,000.

The State Department gives the following:

A majority of the Judiciary Committee have reported a bill providing for the payment from the Alabama fund of the first three classes of claimants enumerated in their report:

1. It proposes to pay all "claims directly resulting from damage done on the high seas by confederate cruisers, whether inculpated or exculpated, whether British-built or otherwise."

It proposes to pay—

For claims for the payment of premiums for war risks, whether paid to corporations, agents, or individuals, after the sailing of any confederate cruiser.

It proposes to pay—

For claims for sums actually paid for insured property destroyed on the high seas by such confederate cruisers, except sums for which judgments have been entered under section 12 of said chapter.

This gracefully omits to name insurance companies but nevertheless provides for them, although their war-premium risks resulted in profit.

These claims will swallow up all the fund and leave nothing to the Government for its losses or for those of the people.

That it will operate as a gross wrong upon the Government and citizens of the United States seems to me susceptible of the clearest proof.

1. The inculpated and exculpated cruisers alike destroyed ships owned or chartered by the Government and destroyed cargoes and other property of the nation besides.

This sufficiently appears from a memorandum furnished from the Navy Department, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, April, 1876.

The United States steamer Hatteras, sunk by the Alabama January 11, 1863. Expenses of Navy Department for Hatteras:

The bill proposes to pay citizens for losses of this character, but makes no provision for the Government loss precisely similar. No provision is made for a suit by the United States against the United States. The Government is regarded as "having no rights" which "Congress" is bound to respect.

Ships and cargoes of American citizens destroyed by inculpated cruisers were insured by foreign underwriters who paid for their loss. Neither the owners nor underwriters make any claim on the fund, and they are expressly excluded by the act of June, 1874. Yet the Geneva award covers this loss, and that portion of the fund represented by it can have no claim on it, except by the Government itself, which is clearly and beyond all doubt entitled to have this covered into the Treasury.

Yet this bill proposes to absorb this portion of the fund in favor of underwriters who have made large profits.

3. The fund was paid to the United States by Great Britain September 9, 1873, and on the same day, by virtue of the act of March 3, 1873, (17 Statutes, page 601,) was "invested in the 5 per cent. registered bonds of the United States," and has been accumulating with interest compounded semi-annually. (House Executive Document No. 149, first session Forty-fourth Congress.) Interest was paid to claimants under the act of June, 1874, from date of loss only at the rate of 4 per cent. not compounded. The award itself covered interest on claims at 6 per cent.

I know that in Williams vs. The United States, before the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, it was said "how the interest was computed is not known." But it is known, and it was 6 per cent. Sir Alexander Cockburn, chief justice of England, the British arbitrator, who, in filing his reasons for dissenting from some of the provisions of the final award, after discussing the subject of interest, says:

At all events, I see no reason why, under all these circumstances, anything more than the lowest rate of interest anywhere prevailing in the United States should be allowed, and I cannot concur in the rate of 6 per cent. adopted by the tribunal.

The award was for $15,500,000 in gold. (Protocol xxix.) The synoptical table presented to the tribunal by Mr. Staempfli on the 2d of September shows that a computation of interest thereon at 6 per cent. for eight years and eight and a half months, since the losses occurred, would make in round numbers the amount of the award. (Protocol xxix.)

The fund has thus enlarged and accumulated. The difference between the 5 per cent. accumulation since the fund was invested and the 4 per cent. allowed on claims will reach near a half million dollars, besides the difference between 6 per cent. included in the award and the 4 per cent. on losses adjudicated under the act of June, 1874. Yet the bill with no shadow of justice proposes to take this accumulation and give it to underwriters who profited by the war.

4. The award of the Geneva tribunal was paid in gold, and the claims allowed under the act of June, 1874, were paid in greenbacks at a discount of 12 per cent. or more on gold. The difference would furnish some measure of compensation to the Government for administering the fund, but this difference yet remains in the fund as an accumulation of it of more than a million. The effect of this bill will be to take this accumulation discounted from claims declared to be valid and just by the act of 1864 and to give it to underwriters rejected by the Congress of 1874, and whom the pending bill declares as the least meritorious of all claimants and only worthy of consideration when other classes are fully paid. Whether the act of 1874 makes any adequate provision for re-imbursing the United States for administering the fund and adjudicating claims, it may be well to consider; but the bill now proposed makes no pretense of a provision for it.

In all its purposes the bill seems to display great skill in ignoring every right of the Government and all the equities of the whole people, both heavy losers by the war. The measure of its justice consists in taking from those who have been losers by the war and giving almost exclusively to those who have profited and grown rich by it. And this is done in the name of justice and statesmanship. Not one of the classes of claims proposed to be paid by the bill has any legal, equitable, or just claim on the fund.

This I proceed to show.

The claim now made upon the fund in behalf of the underwriters is by far larger in amount than that made by all other claimants.

I propose, therefore, first of all, to consider the claims of insurance companies upon the fund.

The act of June 23, 1874, creating the court of commissioners of Alabama claims provides for re-imbursing all underwriters who paid for ships or cargoes destroyed by inculpated British-built confederate cruisers, subject to exceptions declared in these words:

And no claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court by or in behalf of any insurance company or insurer, either in its or his own right, or as assignee, or otherwise, in the right of a person or party insured as aforesaid, unless such claimant shall show to the satisfaction of said court that during the late rebellion the sum of its or his losses, in respect to its or his war risks, exceeded the sum of its or his premiums or other gains upon or in respect to such war risks; and in case of any such allowance the same shall not be greater than such excess of loss. And no claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court arising in favor of any insurance company not lawfully existing at the time of the loss under the laws of some one of the United States.

* Captured while conveying coal under charter with the Navy Department.

Congress has gone very far in its bounty to underwriters. The court of commissioners of Alabama claims decided on the 12th of April that—

Insurance companies and insurers cannot recover in this court unless they show two things: First, that they suffered damage or prove losses by reason of destruction of property by the confederate cruisers Alabama, Florida, and the Shenandoah after she left Melbourne; and, second, that their business in insuring against war risks during the rebellion caused them a net less; both of which being proved they may recover a sum equal to the amount of such net loss in their business, if their losses by said cruisers amounted to the aggregate of such loss, but in no case greater than the amount of such net loss on such war-risk business.

In determining the net loss, the amounts paid and received for re-insurance are to be taken into consideration.

The effect of this is that if an underwriter sustained any loss from an inculpated cruiser, however small, then if upon all his business he sustained loss, whether arising from inculpated or exculpated cruisers, he can be re-imbursed for his loss. He may thus recover from this fund for losses inflicted by exculpated cruisers although no part of it was paid by Great Britain in consequence of or to cover such loss. Under this an underwriter can recover for a loss by an exculpated cruiser when the owner could not. This result was not foreseen or intended by Congress. It adopts a principle which gives color to claims by all who suffered losses from exculpated cruisers.

The only question, therefore, remaining to be determined as to the underwriters is whether any part of the fund shall hereafter be paid to those the sum of whose profits in respect of war risks exceeded their losses. In other words, shall underwriters who profited by the war and war premiums be paid additional sums? If the claim of the underwriters is to be sustained, it must be either because they are entitled to a part of the fund by some principle of law or upon some principle of justice. I will endeavor to show that no claim can be sustained on either ground. And, first, as to a claim on any principle of law.

The chief argument in their behalf is based on the rule of law, that the rights of the assured in the insured property or what may be realized from it. (See Congressional Record of 1873-'74, volume 5, page 3754; Thurman's speech, May 11, 1874; Webster's Works, volume 4, page 156, speech 1835.) No lawyer disputes the existence or soundness of the rule, but how can it be pretended that it has any application here? It is a rule of justice between the insurer and the assured, and extending so far as to be binding on the creditors of the latter, but it is predicated of actual loss. The insurer pays for a total loss of the property insured; the owner, or his representatives, are made whole; the amount paid is much more than the premium received. Why should not the underwriter have turned over to him what may be saved from the wreck? There is manifest justice in the rule. The law is all right, but in the class of cases to which it is now sought to apply it neither the law or the facts apply. The parties insured have no claim on the fund to which the insurance companies can be subrogated.

The underwriters cannot claim any part of the fund upon any principle or doctrine of subrogation for several reasons:

First. The Government holds the fund subject to no legal demand on it, but for distribution in its own discretion.

This is a mixed proposition of law and fact. And as a proposition of law there can be no legal right by subrogation against a fund so held.

That this is the status of the fund is proved by abundant evidence. It was so declared by the Secretary of State, and so understood at Geneva.

It must be borne in mind in any discussion touching the distribution of this fund that no individual claimant or class of individual claimants have or possess any such right or interest in it as can be held to constitute the basis of a legal demand. Prior to the act of Congress of June 23, 1874, there was no law which prescribed any mode of distribution or gave any claimant any legal right.

The whole history of the arbitration proceedings from the commencement of the negotiations that preceded the conclusion of the treaty of Washington of May, 1871, down to the final award of the tribunal at Geneva, on the 14th of September, 1872, establishes first and beyond question this proposition, namely: That the complaint preferred by the Government of the United States against the government of Great Britain was one for national wrong. It was for this alleged national wrong that the Government of the United States demanded from that of Her Britannic Majesty acknowledgment, and, so far as pecuniary indemnity could be considered as compensation for the wrong, agreed to accept such indemnity. This was the real question submitted to the decision of the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva.

Mr. Secretary Fish, himself one of the commissioners of this Government in the negotiation of the treaty, and who, from his position of the first on the joint high commission, and at the same time the President's minister and chief adviser for foreign affairs, must be supposed to have been in full possession of the views of the Government, in his general instructions to the counsel of the United States at the Geneva tribunal imparted to these distinguished lawyers on the 8th of December, 1871, instructions as follows:

The President desires to have the subject discussed as one between the two governments, and he directs me to urge upon you strongly to secure, if possible, the award of a sum in gross. In the discussion of this question, and in the treatment of the entire case, you will be careful not to commit the Government as to the disposition of what may be awarded. * * * It is possible that there may be duplicate claims for some of the property alleged to have been captured or destroyed, as in the cases of insurers and insured. The Government wishes to hold itself free to decide as to the rights and claims of insurers upon the termination of the case. If the value of the property captured or destroyed be recovered in the name of the Government, the distribution of the amount recovered will be made by this Government without committal as to the mode of distribution. It is expected that all such committal be avoided in the argument of counsel. (Papers, &c., volume 2, page 414.)

It will be noticed the Government was not to be committed as to the "disposition" of what might be awarded. It was not necessarily to distribute the money to claimants, but might dispose of it by paying it into the Treasury.

The status of the fund has been determined by a competent court.

The court of commissioners of Alabama claims was created by the act of Congress of June 23, 1874, (18 Statutes, page 245,) for the distribution of a portion of this fund. The attention of the court has been directed to the question of the power of Congress and to its own authority as a court.

In Schreiber and others vs. The United States, (page 4 of the volume of reports of decisions,) the court say:

The court of commissioners of Alabama claims was, by the act of 23d June, 1874, constituted a court, not in form merely, but in every essential attribute of a court. * * * Its jurisdiction is certainly limited to a particular class of subjects, but within the range of its jurisdiction its power to hear, to decide, and to enter judgment is as complete as could be claimed for any court of the most enlarged jurisdiction.

In Williams vs. The United States, (pages 2 and 3,) the court say:

Let not the proper attitude of the claimant to the fund for distribution be misunderstood. Whatever his loss may have been he had not the power to obtain compensation from Great Britain by his own act. * * *

The Government of the United States accepted the sum awarded in full settlement of all the claims comprehended in the terms of the treaty. * * *

It is clear the Government had the right to prescribe the terms on which claimants should present their claims. They were not strong enough to compel payment of the money by Great Britain, and when this Government obtained it the claimants had no legal right to it except that which this Government, by its own acts, chose to accord.

Raynor, Justice, in Hubbell vs. The United States, (page 3,) says:

Nothing can be found in those proceedings to limit or control good faith on the part of our Government in making such allowance to claimants before us as in their judgment and discretion Congress might think proper. In fact the very able committee to whom the British board of trade referred the investigation of the points at issue say in their report:

"The proper compensation for the losses occasioned by the cruisers is the question we have to examine, but with the mode of distributing that among the various claimants, the American Government alone is concerned."

It does not appear from the award or protocols what claims or losses are included in the amount awarded.

The agent of the United States (volume 4 of the papers relating to such treaty, pages 7 and 8) states:

The deliberations of the tribunal on the subject of damages were held with closed doors. * * * It does not appear in the protocols how the arbitrators arrived at the amount. * * * I felt sure that the arbitrators would not consent to send the case to assessors. * * * We therefore devoted our energies toward securing such a sum as should be practically an indemnity to the sufferers. Whether we have or have not been successful can be determined only by the final division of the sum.

Here, then, is a judicial determination against any right existing by subrogation. The fund, in fact, was not given as compensation for injuries to citizens, but as recompense for a failure to perform neutral duties; for the wrong of a nation against a nation. This was well understood by the British government during and after the deliberations of the Geneva tribunal.

Mr. Gladstone, the premier at the time, speaking from his place in the House of Commons, said:

No claims of individuals have been submitted to the arbitration in relation to the Alabama. What was submitted to arbitration was entirely a question between the two governments.

And this he said in specific reference to underwriters and others who had property destroyed by the Alabama.

And in the final argument on behalf of the United States, Mr. Davis said the tribunal "should have regard to all considerations of damage or injury to the United States within the scope of the arbitration."

It will throw light on this question to consider what preceded the treaty of Washington. The Johnson-Clarendon treaty, designed to settle our difficulties with England growing out of the war, contemplated compensation to individuals. It was characterized in the Senate as "a bundle of private claims," and for this reason it was rejected.

The demand of our Government for indemnity from Great Britain rested upon wrongs which furnished a just cause for war, and therefore the reparation belongs to the nation. (Halleck's International Law, page 629.)

There was manifest reason and propriety in reserving to the Government a right either to distribute the fund in its discretion to individual claimants or, as Secretary Fish said, make any other "disposition" of it deemed proper. If, as the fact is, the loss occasioned by the destruction or some of the American vessels and cargoes fell exclusively on the whole people of the country, their equity to be re-imbursed by covering a portion of the fund into the Treasury is higher than that of underwriters who not only lost nothing but absolutely made large profits from "war-risk" premiums.

This is a sufficient answer to the theory that the United States received the fund—

And hold it in trust to be applied in satisfaction of a certain class of injuries to citizens of the United States, for which Great Britain was adjudged by the tribunal of arbitration to be responsible, and not otherwise. (Views of Mr. KNOTT, of minority of Judiciary Committee, page 5.)

The Government is not embarrassed by any such trust. A trust leaves no discretion but to execute it in favor of the cestui que trust. (Gracie vs. New York Insurance Company, decided by Chief Justice Kent.)

Article 10 of the treaty provided that—

In case the tribunal finds that Great Britain had failed to fulfill any duty or duties as aforesaid, and does not award a sum in gross, a board of assessors shall be appointed to ascertain and determine what claims are valid and what amount shall be paid by Great Britain to the United States on account of the liability arising from such failure as to each vessel, according to the extent of such liability as decided by the arbitrators.

But the award was of a sum in gross and was not under the article.

The assessors under this article must have decided specifically on claims, but because this might possibly have given money to insurance companies not entitled to compensation like those now asking it and because it might possibly have left Congress no discretion to so apply a portion of the fund as to indemnify the whole people on whom a large part of the losses ultimately fell, the Geneva tribunal made an award in gross, leaving Congress unembarrassed by any trust and "without committal as to the mode [either] of distribution [or] disposition."

The underwriters find no sanction for the demand they now make in any trust, for none such exists.

Second. The doctrine of subrogation has no application to this fund, because it exists only as a rule of the common law and in equity jurisprudence, but not as against nations in asserting rights or performing duties arising out of international law.

The common law is one system; international law is a very different system.

The common law rests upon reasons applicable to the condition of persons; international law upon reasons applicable to nations.

The distribution or disposition of the fund is not a subject for the application of municipal or common law, but is for the decision of statesmanship and the application of broad principles of justice as applied to particular claimants and the whole people.

We are not now arguing a case as counsel for underwriters in a common-law or equity court, but we are exercising the powers and duties of statesmanship, bound by no merely technical or arbitrary rules, but guided by enlightened principles of justice and right among men. It would be just as appropriate to cite now the dead and buried laws of Lycurgus, or those of China and Japan, as to cite municipal law, for none of these have any relation to the subject under consideration.

But, if we were now in a common-law court, the underwriters are aided in their claim by no principle of the common law.

Third. The underwriters have no right of subrogation on common-law principles applicable among citizens which could reach this fund.

If nations could be measured in their liabilities and duties by the narrow rules of the common law applicable to the affairs of natural or corporate persons, even then the underwriters would have no claim on this fund arising from the doctrine of subrogation.

The inculpated cruisers were the active and operating agents in destroying ships and cargoes to the damage of their owners and underwriters.

The British government did no act and omitted no duty with a view to destroy any particular ship or cargo. The wrong of that government consisted in omitting to prevent the fitting out and sailing from British ports of the confederate cruisers. The wrong was aimed at and intended to be injurious to the American Republic in its national capacity and to the people as a whole. It was an omission of duty through which the cruisers found an opportunity to divert the naval power of the Republic from the suppression of the rebellion and at the same time destroy ships and cargoes of our citizens.

This leads me to state the rule of the common law as to subrogation between private persons.

The right of subrogation exists in favor of an underwriter who has been subjected to liability and made payment on a policy of insurance to all actions against the person whose negligence or wrong is the proximate cause of loss to the assured. But it does not in addition leap over this wrong-doer to reach one never guilty of any act or omission designed to cause the particular loss, but only guilty of an omission of duty through which the actual wrong-doer has found the opportunity to cause the loss. The active agent in the wrong may be reached by the right of subrogation. The causans incurs the liability, but not the causa causans, and by so much the less a party who, guilty of a general wrong purpose but none in the particular case, has afforded opportunity to the actual wrong-doer to inflict damage.

These I assert as principles of common law applicable to natural and corporate persons.

Let us see if I state them correctly.

That the right of subrogation exists against the immediate agent in causing the loss as I have stated will be admitted on all hands. I am not now saying whether the Alabama or her owners or those in command could be held liable in courts for an act done in war. That is a totally different question; but as between natural persons not exercising belligerency the rule is, beyond controversy, as I have stated. Assuming, then, that the commanders of the confederate cruisers were guilty of wrong in destroying American ships insured by underwriters, and that the owners could maintain an action in court against the commanders, and that the underwriters who paid the loss would be subrogated to this right of action, it does not follow that a similar right of action would exist against the British government for the other and different wrong of which it was guilty.

Its wrong was not participation in the destruction of ships, but an omission to prevent the cruisers from sailing from British ports.

In Dixon's Treatise on the Law of Subrogation it is said as to underwriters:

The right of subrogation exists in favor of an insurer who has been subjected to liability and made payment on a policy on the happening of the loss, to all actions against the person by whose negligence or wrong the loss was caused. (Page 151.)

This is a clear and full statement of the entire extent to which the right of subrogation exists. It will be noticed it goes only—

Against the person by whose negligence or wrong the loss was caused.

That is, against the person who is the proximate cause of the loss.

But it does not reach those whose omission of duty in other respects may have opened the way through which the actual wrong-doer passed in his wrongful purpose to cause a loss.

The rule as here stated would reach the commander of the cruisers "by whose wrong the loss was caused," but would not reach Great Britain who opened the doors of her ports to permit the commanders and cruisers to pass out to sea for the general purpose of preying on American commerce.

It may be noticed that every case cited by Dixon is limited to the action against the wrong-doer whose act was the proximate cause of the loss.

I feel safe in asserting that not one case can be found in all the books which carries the subrogated right of action beyond the person whose wrong was the proximate cause of the loss.

The case of Comegys vs. Vasse, 1 Peters, 193, has been cited as an authority against this position, but it directly proves it, and shows that the right of subrogation now claimed against the Alabama fund finds no sanction upon any principle of subrogation.

By the Spanish treaty of 1819 our Government, in consideration of the cession of Florida, agreed—

To make satisfaction * * * to citizens of the United States for all claims upon the government of Spain arising from the unlawful seizures at sea and in the ports and territories of Spain or the Spanish colonies. (8 Statutes, page 258, articles 9–11.)

The treaty and the act of March 3, 1821, created commissioners to assess the damages, (3 Statutes, page 639.) Vasse, as an underwriter on vessels of American citizens, had paid for vessels captured and carried into Spanish ports and abandoned to him. Vasse became bankrupt and assigned his effects to Comegys. The commissioners in 1824 awarded to Comegys $8,840, which was paid from the Treasury.

Vasse sued Comegys to recover this, upon the ground that it did not pass by the assignment. But the court held it did. Mr. Justice Story, in commenting on the effect of an abandonment for total loss and full payment by the underwriter, cited authorities to show that the spes recuperandi belonged to the insurer, and he said of their reasoning that it–

Goes to show that whatever may be recovered or received, whether in the course of judicial proceedings or otherwise, as a compensation for the loss belongs to the underwriters.

That was a case where the Spanish government assumed the act of Spanish subjects in seizing American vessels. The wrongful act thus made the act of Spain was the proximate cause of the loss.

In this respect it differs from the wrong of Great Britain. The wrongful act of the confederate government and cruisers was the proximate cause of the loss for which the underwriters now ask compensation, not the wrongful omission of duty by Great Britain.

In the Spanish treaty our Government for a valuable consideration agreed to pay our citizens damages for the unlawful Spanish seizures. Under the treaty of Washington our Government made no such agreement, but reserved the right to "dispose" of the fund in its discretion.

The underwriter Vasse suffered loss, while the underwriters whose claims I insist shall be denied made their war insurance a source of profit.

Under the Spanish treaty no claim was made except by Vasse and his right was not controverted. Now the claim of the underwriters is controverted, and Congress by the act of June 23, 1874, declared them entitled to nothing.

The losses by Spanish seizures fell exclusively on ship-owners or underwriters; the losses resulting from confederate cruisers fell largely on the whole people.

The opinion of Justice Story was in a case which furnishes no analogy for questions now to be decided, and gives no color to any right by subrogation.

Substantially the same remarks apply to the case of Randall vs. Cochrane, 1 Vesey, 98, in which no element mingled but the naked question whether a fund confessedly created to pay a loss belonged to the assured, who had already been fully paid by the insurer, or to the insurer himself. It was not difficult to decide that the assured had no right to double payment. The case of Rogers vs. Hosack's Executors, 18 Wendell, 319, adds no new principle to the cases which I have already mentioned.

As to all the cases cited to support the claim of the insurance companies on the ground of subrogation, it is certain they only relate to claims of underwriters—

Against a fund which has by the terms of an award been in so many words given to a specified owner. (Campbell vs. Mullett, 2 Swanston, chapter 551, margin.)

This is by no means the condition of the Alabama fund.

The opinion of Attorney-General Hoar (13 Opinions, 182) merely recognizes the "rule of subrogation in a case where, under the statutes of the United States, the Government was legally bound to pay for a vessel which had been lost."

That was a case over which a judicial court could take cognizance founded on legal right; but here there is no judicial cognizance, no legal right, no moral obligation, or equity in favor of the underwriters.

It has been alleged in support of the claim of the underwriters that the British-American mixed commission, under the twelfth article of the treaty of Washington, awarded damages to underwriters for British property destroyed or damaged by American vessels. (17 Statutes, 868; Congressional Record, volume 5, for 1873-'74, page 3754; volume 6; Papers relating to treaty of Washington, being Hale's report, page 196.)

It is sufficient to say that any claims of this class occupy substantially the position of claims under the Spanish treaty of 1819. By the treaty of Washington it was provided in substance—

That all claims of corporations, companies, or private individuals, subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, upon the Government of the United States, arising out of acts committed against the persons or property of subjects of Her Britannic Majesty during the period between the 13th of April, 1861, and the 9th of April, 1865, inclusive, * * * shall be referred to three commissioners, who shall carefully examine and decide according to justice and equity all such claims as shall be laid before them.

The commissioners were also to decide in like manner all such claims of citizens of the United States against Great Britain other than claims growing out of the British-built confederate cruisers.

In the distribution of indemnities or funds like that derived from the British government, Congress has denied the claims of underwriters, as now asserted in this bill, either by subrogation or otherwise. It was refused after full discussion when the act of June 23, 1874, was passed. This only followed the usage of Congress.

Governor Washburn, of Massachusetts, the honest and faithful chairman of the Committee of Claims in this House for so many years, gives his testimony as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Boston, January 24, 1873.

DEAR SIR: While I was on the Committee of Claims for six years several cases of insurance companies were presented where property had been lost or destroyed on which they had paid the insurance. The committee always dismissed the claim on the ground that they were paid for the risk, and could not ask the Government to hold them harmless.

Yours, truly,

W. B. WASHBURN.

GEO. A. SHATTUCK, Esq.

And this accords with the practice of the British government.

In support of this I will read a clear and forcible statement of this subject, as follows:

British property was in, and British underwriters had insured the cargoes of, ships which were destroyed by the Alabama. They, claiming that by the Geneva award American citizens had been indemnified for similar loss, asked indemnity of their government.

Under the advice of the law officers the British government rejected their claim.—London Times, May 24, 1873, as quoted in Foreign Relations of the United States, 1873, part 1, page 363.

During the debate in the British Parliament Mr. Anderson asked:

"If we were obliged to pay for damage sustained by the Americans by reason of the conduct of the Alabama, why were we not equally bound to pay for the damage sustained by our own subjects by reason of the acts of that vessel?"—London Times, May 27, 1873; Foreign Relations United States, part 1, page 371.

Mr. Gladstone, then prime minister, said:

"It appears to be implied that the government submitted the claims of certain persons not subjects of Her Majesty to arbitration.

"This is altogether a mistake. No claims of individuals have been submitted to arbitration in relation to the Alabama.

"What was submitted to arbitration was entirely a question between the two governments."—Idem., page 377.

If the claims now asserted by the underwriters had accrued in time of peace and if the nations concerned could be subjected to common-law rules, this law would not permit the insurers to leap over the commanders of the confederate cruisers and the confederate government itself to seek indemnity from the British government. This would be a remedy per saltum. No rule of the common law, civil or criminal, would give a right of action or prosecution.

Great Britain did not by any act of hers attack any American ship. She could not be criminally responsible, even if subjected to laws applicable to natural persons, because that would require evidence of a specific intent on her part to aid the attack on a particular ship destroyed. (Ogletree vs. State, 28 Alabama, page 693; 2 Southern Law Review, new series, page 91, April, 1876.)

In Langredge vs. Levy, 2 Meeson & Welsby, page 530, an action was brought to recover damages resulting from a fraudulent misrepresentation of property sold, and it was claimed in argument—

That wherever a duty is imposed on a person by contract or otherwise, and that duty is violated, any one who is injured by the violation of it may have a remedy against the wrong-doer.

But Park, baron, denied that this was law in its full extent, and said he could not maintain—

A principle which would lead to that indefinite extent of liability.

To create liability, he said, the act complained of must result—

Not from an act remote and consequential, but one contemplated by the defendant at the time as one of its results.

This was sustained in Winterbottom vs. Wright, 10 Meeson and Welsby, 107, by Lord Abinger.

The supreme court of Ohio, in a case involving this principle, said:

The influences of human conduct, good or bad, are far-reaching, and are often seen and felt in consequences exceedingly remote but uncertain and complicated. It is simply impossible that municipal law should take cognizance of all these consequences. From necessity a large share of them must be left to the jurisdiction of public opinion, individual conscience, and finally to the retributions of another world. (Wells vs. Cook, 16 Ohio State R., 73.)

In 2 Greenleaf on Evidence, section 562, it is said:

The damage to be recovered must always be the natural and proximate consequence of the act complained of. This rule is laid down in regard to special damage, but it applies to all damage.

The remote consequences of a wrong are not the subject of relief by municipal law.

The claim of the underwriters against Great Britain, or the fund which she paid, is not so strong as would be the right of a life insurance company to an action against a party wrongfully killing a person on whose life a policy had been issued and the loss paid. But such right of action does not exist. (Connecticut Life Insurance Company vs. New York and New Haven Railroad, 25; Connecticut, page 235.) No action against an incendiary accrues to a fire insurance company which pays a loss by his crime. (Rockingham Insurance Company vs. Borker, 39 Maine, page 253; Clark vs. Inhabitants, 2 Barnewell & Cresswell, page 254.)

The British courts are open alike to subjects and aliens on a petition of right; but the underwriters would find no redress there, because the courts cannot say the political power has done wrong. (Law of Claims against Governments, page 192-206, being House Report No. 134, second session Forty-third Congress; Mississippi vs. Johnson, 4 Wallace, page 497; Gibbons vs. The United States, 8 Wallace, page 269; Campbell vs. Mullett, 2 Swanton's Chancery, [552,] page 587.)

But Great Britain was not exempt from liability. Her liability arose by no rule of common law. It existed by international law, and was settled in the modes which that law pointed out.

Diplomacy is the peaceful remedy, and arms the remedy of last resort. The remedy has been sought against England, restitution has been made, and now the fund which has resulted so far as not already distributed is to be "disposed" of—not necessarily "distributed" to individual claimants—as the principles of justice require.

If it were necessary to pursue this inquiry further it might be urged that although our Government had a right to demand of Great Britain reparation for her wrong, yet the underwriters could make no such demand.

The commanders of the inculpated cruisers were the immediate and direct agents in destroying American ships. They were guilty of the wrong. Great Britain was not even an accessory before the fact. Her wrong was the failure to prevent the cruisers from going to sea.

But the owners of ships destroyed have never been able to pursue any remedy against the cruisers or their commanders, the principals in the wrong, and they could not legally pursue even an accessory where a principal could not be pursued.

Neither the ship-owners nor underwriters have sought any remedy by action in court against the commanders of the inculpated cruisers. If they are protected from such action in court by their belligerent character, then it is difficult to perceive how a claim could arise on ordinary legal principles in favor of ship-owners or underwriters against Great Britain for her indirect agency in the wrong. If the commanders of inculpated cruisers are not protected from civil action by their belligerency, as may be inferred from the rulings of courts in West Virginia and elsewhere, then ship-owners and underwriters should exhaust that remedy before making a demand upon this fund, which is subject to the claims of the Government and citizens of the whole country upon it as indemnity for losses sustained by and in consequence of the war.

The underwriters, then, have no claim upon this fund upon any principle of law.

I now proceed to show that the equitable demand on behalf of the whole people to cover this fund into the Treasury is stronger than any claim of the underwriters upon it.

The underwriters provided for in this bill have no claim upon the fund, for reasons which I will state rather than argue, as follows:

1. Because they suffered no loss, but made profit from their aggregate war risks.

To appropriate money now for their benefit will simply verify the declaration of Holy Writ, which proves that the penalties of misfortune shall be increased: "To him that hath shall be given, but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he seemeth to have."

2. Money given to cash insurance companies now, will operate as a bonus in favor of stockholders now, who as a general rule were not stockholders during the war, and who consequently have no shadow of equitable claim on the fund.

3. As to mutual-insurance companies, the same objection appears with still greater force.

4. The claims of the insurance companies were rejected by the Geneva tribunal, which, as their award says,

Set aside all double claims for the same losses, meaning the claims of underwriters for losses which had already been presented by and in the name of the Government.

5. Because the Geneva tribunal refused to make an award under article 10 of the treaty, which would have required a board of assessors to pass on specific claims in favor of persons, thus possibly raising an equity or trust in their favor, and instead of this awarded a sum in gross to the United States to avoid any possible claim of underwriters.

6. Because, as already shown, the underwriters have no legal claim on the fund.

7. Because, as already shown, the award was specifically compensation to the nation, on a national claim, and for national damages.

The cause of action was the wrong of Great Britain in failing to observe an international duty to the United States.

8. Because the uniform usage of Congress in the distribution of indemnities has been to reject the doctrine of subrogation, as proposed by this bill, in favor of underwriters.

9. Because this is the universal rule of law in England and other countries.

But it may be said if the underwriters should be excluded from all share in the Alabama fund, because on their aggregate war risks they made profit, the same rule should be applied to citizens who lost cargoes and vessels having no insurance, if upon these aggregate ventures they made profits.

It may be true that the same rule should be applied. Certainly if they made reasonable profits they have not suffered any loss which should be re-imbursed. And if they made such profits the loss has not fallen on them, but has in fact fallen upon those from whom the profits were made—from the whole people—the consumers of imports and the producers of exports. It is certainly good morals and exact justice that the fund created to meet losses should be distributed for the benefit of those who sustained the losses. If in the act of 1874 a mistake was made in this respect, it is now too late to remedy it.

But it is not correct to say that in all cases the same rule should be applied to private citizens that should be applied to underwriters, whether citizens or corporations. Underwriters, whether citizens or corporations, exercise a public function which concerns the whole people. Corporations owe their creation to legislation; they exercise such powers as the law authorizes; they are subject to legislative regulation, and they are entitled to such rights as the law has already given. Their claim to powers and to rights are alike to be strictly construed. The law has given them no right to any part of this fund, as has been abundantly shown, and if we now give it to them we thrust upon them a gratuity to which they have no right in law or equity and no just claim in conscience or good morals.

And now, as compared with the demands of the underwriters, what are the equities of the whole people to have the residue of this fund "covered into the Treasury" for their common benefit?

During the war American ship-owners and merchants chose to carry on commerce with foreign nations. The advantage of sailing under the American flag was, besides others, that our ships escaped tonnage-duties which were required of foreign bottoms, (Revised Statutes, § 4219.) This was a vast advantage. It is to be presumed, and the fact undoubtedly is, that the carrying trade and the commerce as a whole were profitable to ship-owners and to merchants. But, whether it was or not, they chose voluntarily to embark in the business and to run the risk. The Government never undertook to guarantee success or profits in this business nor in any other in which our citizens were engaged. Ship-owners and merchants knew the dangers of the war and they took its risks. They generally indemnified themselves from loss by insurance against war risks, for which they paid war premiums.

For all the risks ship-owners charged such freights, and merchants, exporters, and importers added such percentage to the cost of commodities as paid for all and gave a profit besides. Ship-owners lost ships; exporters and importers lost goods by the wrongful acts of confederate cruisers, but they were as a class, and as a general rule, made whole with profits added by the rates and prices charged on other transactions. They were generally saved from particular losses by insurance, or, if not, it was because they chose to save the cost of insurance in the prospect of enlarging their gains. The war risks and war losses fell on the producers of exports and the consumers of imports. They alone were the losers by the war. Because of this a demand was made upon Great Britain in the name of the United States and for the national loss. The demand was sustained in this character, as compensation for the loss, and in terms which exclude all legal demand of individual claimants. Congress has very liberally and justly paid from the fund all individual and corporate claimants who suffered loss on account of any wrong for which indemnity was given by Great Britain.

The unappropriated residue of the fund should be covered into the Treasury for the following reasons:

1. It was "indemnity paid by Great Britain to the United States" as a nation, and for a national loss, and is therefore in law the property of the nation.

2. The whole people having suffered the loss growing out of the wrongs of Great Britain for which the indemnity was paid, the whole people may in justice as well as law demand that the indemnity be now covered into the Treasury as part compensation for their losses.

3. None of the claimants under the bill have any legal right to any part of the fund.

4. None of them have any right arising from loss resulting from the wrong of Great Britain for which the fund was paid as reparation.

I now proceed to notice another class of claims provided for in this bill. It proposes to re-imburse citizens who paid "premiums for war risks * * * after the sailing of any confederate cruiser."

These parties have no claim in law or justice on any part of the fund. I will simply state, rather than argue, the reasons which seem to me conclusive on this subject. They should not be re-imbursed—

1. Because the Geneva tribunal of arbitration decided in accordance with international law that "these claims do not constitute upon principles of international law * * * good foundation for an award of compensation." Here is an adjudication against the claimants by the highest competent tribunal. The question is res adiudicata. The claimants are supported by no law.

2. The claimants sustained no loss. The war premiums they paid, like other expenses of prosecuting business during the war, attached to commodities produced or consumed by the people on whom the whole burden ultimately fell.

3. If the claimants had sustained loss, they are in no better condition to indemnity out of this fund than any other class of citizens who in consequence of the war suffered loss in business from the public enemy. It is a rule of public law that all residents of a country take the chances of war. The Government is not liable for damages done by or growing out of the acts of the enemy.—House Report No. 134, second session, Forty-third Congress, page 266.

The report of the majority of the committee says as to these "war premiums:"

It is alleged that in some instances the premium was also insured, and that some benefit was received by this class of persons by the non-payment of the tonnage duty required from persons sailing under foreign flags. If the Congress conclude that these war premiums should be paid, it can provide for the proper deductions, so that the actual loss only shall be received by the claimant.

But the bill ignores even this, and proposes to make double payment, and that, too, without deductions in consequence of exemption from tonnage duties.

As to this class of claims it is urged that the Government abandoned them in consideration of the "three rules" of international law agreed upon in the treaty. The report of the majority of the Judiciary Committee submits its proof as follows:

The treaty of Washington also contained, as before suggested, international rules regarded by the United States as far more valuable than any pecuniary remuneration.

This further appears by the fact that in the interval between the Clarendon-Johnson treaty and the treaty of Washington the President recommended to the Congress the taking of proof as to the ownership of the claims against Great Britain, and their settlement by this Government with the view of vesting the ownership of the private claims in the United States.—President's message, December 5, 1870.

The Earl of Granville, writing to the American minister under date of March 20, 1872, states in regard to the concessions of the treaty of Washington:

"Nor can it have been expected by the Government of the United States that concessions of this importance would have been made by this country if the United States was still to be at liberty to insist upon all the extreme demands which they had at any time suggested or brought forward." (Volume 2 of Papers relating to Treaty of Washington, page 438.)

The American minister, page 516, says:

"I think the principle declared in this article (the fifth) for future observance between the two nations is one which, if settled and maintained, must be of inestimable advantage to the United States."

The Secretary of State, in writing of these "indirect claims," page 476, says:

"The United States now desire no pecuniary award on their account. * * * In the correspondence I have gone as far as prudence would allow in intimating * * * that we should be content with an award that a state is not liable in pecuniary damages for the indirect results of a failure to observe its neutral obligations. * * * This Government expects to be in the future, as it has been in the past, a neutral much more of the time than a belligerent."

In regard to the withdrawal of the claim for indirect losses (page 526 of such papers) the following appears:

"In consideration thereof the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, consents that he will make no claim on the part of the United States in respect of indirect losses as aforesaid before the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva."

At page 532 the British minister writes—

"That the Senate considered that the adoption of the wider principle with regard to indirect claims would be an equivalent for the consent given by the President that he would make no claim for indirect losses before the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva."

It is stated by the Secretary of State (page 533) that the President, to preserve such a treaty, "has been willing to make large concessions."

The American minister writes (page 560) to the Earl of Granville:

"I am now authorized * * * to say that the Government of the United States regards the new rule * * * as the consideration for and to be accepted as a final settlement of the three classes of the indirect claims put forth in the case of the United States."

The Secretary of State (page 579) says:

"This is an attainment of an end which this Government had in view in the putting forth of those claims. We had no desire for a pecuniary reward, but desired an expression by the tribunal as to the liability of a neutral for claims of that character."

The counsel of the United States (page 223, volume 3) state—

"That the United States did not insist on extravagant damages; their object was a higher one, and one more important to them."

The learned counsel (page 224) say:

"We * * * have acted accordingly * * * regarding a mere question of the amount of national damages to be awarded as secondary to the higher consideration of the welfare and the honor of the United States."

I have read this extended extract from the report to give the whole argument and the proofs. But if the proof were conclusive, as it is not, will it follow that the Government should pay these claims?

These claims for indirect damage were excluded by the law as laid down in the treaty. The wisdom and justice of the law are not controverted. The law is good law as to these claims under the particular circumstances, and good at all times and under all circumstances.

In securing this declaration of law, the United States performed a duty. The performance of a duty cannot be urged as a reason for charging the Government with liability in damages. A right to damages can only arise from a wrong.

And besides, the arbitrators decided, and correctly, that independently of the treaty these claimants were entitled to no compensation from Great Britain, and consequently they have no claim on the fund awarded to our Government.

The rejection of the claims for indirect damages resulted from no "new rule" of law. The American minister in so characterizing it did not speak with accuracy. It was an old rule.

When he referred to it "as the consideration for * * * the three classes of indirect claims" he evidently meant only that the plain enunciation of this old rule by a new declaration of it put an end to this class of claims either by our Government or by claimants. The idea simply was, not that the Government had bartered away any valid claim of any citizen or surrendered any real right, but that the declaration of the rule, while it cut off these claims, was worth more to our nation and our citizens than the payment of the indirect damages would have been.

If this Government had secured the payment of the indirect damages it would have "gained a great loss"—the loss to result from a bad rule of law.

The declaration of the rule of law, then, was not in fact a "consideration" for the surrender of claims. This Government "surrendered" nothing. It submitted the claims to the proper court, which decided them invalid.

The law which the court announced was not a consideration for the claims, but it was a consolation that, though our citizens did not recover or the nation for them, yet our citizens obtained a much more valuable consideration.

There is no ground, then, on which these claimants are entitled to any part of the Alabama fund or to any compensation from the Government.

It might as well be said the Government would be liable for damages if Congress made a new law or declared an old one as in force, which defeated unfounded claims set up against it.

It only remains to consider the question whether those who suffered losses from the exculpated cruisers have any claim on this fund or occupy a position in which any portion of it can properly be given to them.

The report of the majority of the Judiciary Committee says as to this class of claimants:

The United States, as successors to the confederacy, became entitled to its war cruisers. The Shenandoah was taken and sold by this Government in Great Britain. (Alabama Claims Correspondence, volume 3, pages 319-447;) which seizure prevented, as has been shown to your committee, the owner of one of the ships destroyed by the Shenandoah before it entered Melbourne from bringing his libel in a British court.

In the view of your committee, the most direct loss is that sustained by the persons who had vessels destroyed on the high seas by the cruisers exculpated by the tribunal of arbitration, as not falling within its view of the three rules of international law established by the treaty of Washington, and by other confederate cruisers during the period of the rebellion.

This refers to the ship Delphine, of Bangor, destroyed by the Shenandoah after Melbourne, December 29, 1864.

After the war the Shenandoah returned to England, was surrendered to the British authorities on the 6th of November, 1865, and they about the 12th of November turned her over as confederate property to Mr. Adams, our minister at the court of St. James.

Upon the suppression of the rebellion, by a well-known rule of public law, the United States as conquerors became the owner of the Shenandoah. The committee do not pretend that the British government, in the Geneva award or otherwise, paid any money to the United States for the destruction of the Delphine or any other vessel destroyed by any exculpated cruiser. On the contrary, the Geneva tribunal decided that Great Britain was in no fault, and so not liable for any act of the exculpated cruisers.

The report of the committee puts the liability of this Government on the ground that its sale of the Shenandoah "prevented" the owner of the Delphine "from bringing his libel in a British court."

If this created a claim in favor of the owner against the Government, his right of action would arise in the nature of an action on the case, and would exist independently of the fund. No claim to the fund can be predicated on this.

Yet a majority of the committee on this ground propose to compensate not only the one claimant alleging this reason for relief, but all others who have no such reason. The assumed merit of his claim is to draw after it all others without such merit.

But the merit is assumed only; it does not exist.

Why should the Government be held liable for the loss of the Delphine? It has again and again been proved that this Government is not liable to our citizens for wrongs done them by the public enemy in war, and no man disputes it. The Government is not liable, then, by reason of the wrong of the Shenandoah.

It is a universal rule of law that when the Government does only what is lawful in the pursuit of its legitimate and appropriate business, it cannot be held responsible in damages. The right to damages is predicated of a wrong by the party liable.

The Government in accepting and selling the Shenandoah performed a duty. The law of nations vested the title of the Shenandoah in the United States. In accepting and selling the Government performed a lawful duty in a lawful mode.

If for this the Government is to respond in damages by the solemn decision of the legislative power of the nation, it will be the first time in the world's history that the performance of an admitted duty has been deemed a reason for punishment.

But if the owner of the Delphine had a right to institute a libel, he failed to do so not from any wrong of the Government.

He could maintain no libel after the surrender of the Shenandoah, and prior to that she was not within his reach. He had no remedy, therefore, with which the Government interfered.

But it is urged again in support of this class of claims that the Johnson-Clarendon treaty comprehended as a ground for damages in favor of citizens of the United States the hasty recognition by the Queen's proclamation of confederate belligerency; that this, if insisted on, would have decreed the payment of this class of claims, (Johnson to Seward, Message and Documents Department of State, part 1, page 411, for 1868-'69; Papers Relating to Alabama Question, volume 3, page 205;) that in the treaty of Washington the United States abandoned this claim, (Papers, &c., volume 3, page 106, 203-205; Report House Judiciary Committee, Forty-third Congress, page 7;) and in consideration of this abandonment, the Government received in the treaty an apology from Great Britain and three rules of international law, neither of which were in the rejected Johnson-Clarendon treaty, (Papers, &c., volume 3, page 205; House Judiciary Committee Report, Forty-third Congress, page 7.)

In the treaty Great Britain did "express regret for the escape of the Alabama and other vessels from British ports and for the depredations."

The treaty provided that the arbitrators in deciding the matters submitted to them should be governed by "three rules," which were agreed to be applicable to the case. These rules were:

A neutral government is bound—

First. To use diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping within its jurisdiction of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or to carry on war against a power with which it is at peace; and also to use like diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise or carry on war as above, such vessel having been specially adapted, in whole or in part, within such jurisdiction, to warlike use.

Secondly, not to permit or suffer either belligerent to make use of its ports or waters as the base of naval operations against the other or for the purpose of the renewal or augmentation of military supplies of arms or the recruitment of men.

Thirdly, to exercise due diligence in its own ports and waters and, as to all persons within its jurisdiction to prevent any violation of the foregoing obligations and duties.

After the treaty had been agreed upon the Secretary of State, in his letter of April 23, 1872, to General Schenck, in relation to our claim for indirect damages, said:

In the correspondence I have gone as far as prudence would allow in intimating that we neither desired nor expected any pecuniary award, and that we should be content with an award that a State is not liable in pecuniary damages for the indirect results of a failure to observe its neutral obligations. This Government expects to be in the future as it has been in the past, a neutral much more of the time than a belligerent.

The Geneva tribunal decided that this was the rule of international law on the subject.

The three rules were also rules of international law. They were law prior to and independently of the treaty. The treaty in this respect was only declaratory of what was always law. Both parties agreed it was the law applicable to the case. The consideration for so declaring it was the mutual advantage to result to both parties in the arbitration, and to all nations for all time, of having correct law founded on the eternal principles of right and sound policy well defined and understood.

There is no evidence that our Government bartered any right of these claimants for this declaration of law or for the apology.

There is no evidence that our Government bartered away any duty it owed to these claimants.

The Government did not urge a claim for damages based on the hasty recognition by Great Britain of confederate belligerency, because the Senate had rejected the Johnson-Clarendon treaty which set up such a claim, or, to speak precisely, did not exclude it. The Government did not press this claim, because it did not regard it as based on sound law. It is to be presumed the Government did its whole duty.

The arbitrators rejected the claim for pursuing confederate cruisers, and for the same and still other and stronger reasons must have rejected the remotely consequential damages for hasty recognition of belligerency. It is alleged that the claim for damages based on this hasty recognition was withheld by the Government "for its own interest," (House of Representatives Judiciary Committee, Forty-third Congress, page 7,) and that hence these claimants lost indemnity.

This is a non sequitur.

If the claim had been pressed it would have been unavailing.

If it had been a proper claim to make no damages could have been awarded because of any loss of these claimants, for their losses were so long after the recognition that they resulted from the full-grown war and not from the prior recognition. The proximate cause of loss is the only ground of relief in any case, not the remote. But what is meant by saying that the Government omitted to press this claim "for its own interest?"

If "for its own interest," which is the salus populi suprema lex, it omitted to press a claim which neither law, justice, nor policy sanctioned, and which would have been injurious to us as a law precedent hereafter, then it performed a duty.

We may hereafter desire to recognize the belligerency of Ireland, of Canada, or Cuba, and we may not afford to say the nation shall be called to account for so doing. We cannot afford to make precedents which "may return to plague the inventors."

No citizen can complain of the Government for asserting such principles of law, and so managing its international disputes as will be "for its own interest," and certainly not, if in so doing it asserts sound law and manages its controversies right.

Will it be said the Government should not act "for its own interest," but should imperil its interests and the peace of the world in future in order to secure insignificant claims for money by asserting law unworthy of "the dignitaries who preside on the township bench?"

To conclude, these claimants should not be re-imbursed, because—

1. The Geneva tribunal decided that on principles of well-settled law and justice Great Britain was not liable for this class of damages.

2. The Geneva award having given this fund for other damages, it would be a perversion of it to give any portion of it to those claimants who have been solemnly adjudged not entitled to any compensation.

3. These claimants are in no better condition to ask indemnity out of this fund than any other class of citizens who in consequence of the war suffered loss in business from the public enemy.

In view of all that I have said, I believe the Alabama fund, so far as not exhausted in paying judgments under the act of June 23, 1874, and the supplemental act, should be covered into the Treasury for the common benefit of all the people.

The Congress of 1874, in the fifteenth section of the act to which I have referred, declared that—

> When all such payments shall have been made, any such bonds remaining—in which the fund was invested—shall also be canceled and extinguished.

Let us now re-affirm that policy, and do justice to the whole people and wrong to none.

FINANCES.

Mr. PIPER. Mr. Chairman, for the last fifteen years the currency problem has been a fruitful subject of speculation among politicians and political economists. Nominating conventions, national, State, or county, have scarcely met when this question would spring up, and the opinions expressed thereon and the plans of inflation or contraction advocated have been as varied as the faces of the members. The legislator, therefore, who sets himself earnestly to work to discover a remedy for our multifarious financial complaints runs a great risk of becoming a mere theorist, or even of ending his days in a lunatic asylum, through the perplexities arising from the study of these conflicting and confusing dogmas. If the legislator really desires to receive correct answers to these complex financial questions, he had better, like the great lawgiver of antiquity, go up into a mountain apart, not for forty days but for forty years, and, should he come down with a direct revelation from on high, he might find the people worshiping not a golden calf, but more likely a paper idol.

Having had the good fortune, since arriving at man's estate, of living in a community where the circulating medium is real money, it may be said with apparent justice that I can have no correct knowledge of the advantages of money turned out from a printing-press—of money which has no value except that given to it by legislative enactment; I hope, therefore, that my fellow-members and those who may take the trouble to read my views will consider my inexperience and treat me with charity.

It is somewhat ungracious I admit to criticise severely the delusions of others, when under like circumstances we ourselves would probably have fallen into the very same mistakes—for no one can deny that the party in power has made great mistakes on the currency question, having established and still keeping up an unwise and blundering, if not practically dishonest, system of finance. But we should not look into the past except to profit by its lessons in the future, as no good can arise from crimination or recrimination. As wise legislators, without making this a party question or a party issue, we should use all our endeavors to find, if possible, a remedy for the money embarrassments from which we are suffering at the present time; for one of the greatest evils that can befall a country is undoubtedly the curse of an irredeemable paper currency—a very Pandora's box, from which in our case even delusive Hope seems to have escaped, since, according to some predictions, we shall never again resume specie payments.

The precious metals have formed the standard of value from the earliest times and I presume always will, and the great problem of the present day is to ascertain the best method of returning to this standard, nine-tenths of the people of this country earnestly desiring this consummation if it can be accomplished without too great a financial convulsion and too violent a disruption of business relations. Gold and silver are endowed with properties which especially fit them for a circulating medium. The supply, while comparatively limited, is also remarkably steady, and the effect of an increase or diminution of production can be calculated with much more certainty than that of any other commodity. From these peculiarities gold and silver are especially valuable as a universal standard of prices, and by the general consent of mankind, from the remotest antiquity, they have been adopted as the common medium of exchange. This proposition, if necessary, might be supported by illustrations taken from the works of a long series of writers on political economy, commerce, and finance, and by the unconscious testimony of the sacred and profane classics, and of poets and historians of every age. We are met here, however, by a class of theorists who deny that the precious metals are the best and the only true universal standards of value. These Utopian philosophers, having revived doctrines on the subject of money long since refuted by argument and exploded by experience, now present them to the American people with all the airs of original discoverers, and attempt to crush their antagonists with sarcasm and with quotations from the Bible and the old dramatists, from doggrel political squibs and sensational advertisements of quack medicines. Amusing hits at hard-money men are carefully studied out and darted upon them with painful and elaborate precision, but with so ill-concealed an effort, that the veriest tyro can detect the smell of the lamp.

Who can refute a sneer or a witticism? The great master of the art of logic has laid down no rule for answering the argument of a laugh, which in a serious discussion almost amounts to a confession of defeat. The intricate problems of finance discussed by the United States Treasury officers in their reports are not solved by ridicule. When the Comptroller of the Currency endeavors to reconcile principles based on long experience and sound judgment with the imperious demands of ignorant party leaders or the after-dinner theories of a vacillating third-term sphinx, he is not answered by allusions to the "Vicar of Bray" and "Demetrius the silversmith." The Director of the Mint, through a competent and conscientious geologist and chemist, has ascertained that the silver lodes of Nevada are not "pocket mines," and his report, which has removed a black stain from the American character, should not be put in the class of glowing advertisements of patent medicines. The policy of the purchase of silver bullion by Government demands a more serious illustration than the utterly senseless one of the acquisition of a useless door-plate. The prominent participation of a United States embassador with a speculative mining company of doubtful origin has excited serious comment on the low sense of propriety and honor exhibited by high officials, and such a subject deserves graver illustration than a rehash of old jokes, or the sarcasm that if silver continues to depreciate, private manufactories of coin will be established all over the country, especially in the neighborhood of the "Big Bonanza"—a singularly inaccurate statement, since the coinage act of 1873, under the penalty of $1,000 fine and three years' imprisonment, prohibits the making by private individuals of any coin in the resemblance or similitude of the minor coinage.

Again, the truth of any principle or law of finance or trade is not affected by proving that the advocate of any particular line of policy has arrived at incorrect conclusions through the hasty generalization of an insufficient number of separate facts. The hard-money men, under the opprobrious epithets of dogmatists, theorists, and college lecturers, are with apparent triumph referred to Chevalier's essay on the "Probable Fall of Gold," and it is asserted that his plan to establish in France an exclusively silver coinage has failed through the depreciation of that metal in comparison with gold. The inflationists, however, very carefully abstain from quoting Chevalier's arguments or the modifications of his plan which might be rendered necessary in case of an increased production of silver. They content themselves with sneering at the elaborate expositions of the distinguished French political economist, and suppose that he is refuted by the brief comment, "Pretty standards are these commodities which dance so gay a dance in change of value." With what boldness is the ignorance of this House presumed upon when a statement so widely at variance with fact is insinuated rather than asserted! The value of a troy ounce of English standard silver was 59¼ pence, or 121 cents, in 1849, and in 1874 it had fallen to 58 5/16 pence, or 118 cents—a decline of less than 2½ per cent in 25 years. And this small variation in value is spoken of as if silver danced up and down the scale like the mercury in a thermometer tube when breathed upon by a playful schoolboy. Wonderful forgetfulness of the change of value of the paper standard when our paper currency during four years danced up and down as violently as a Mohammedan dervish, and on July 11, 1864, fell as low as 38 cents on the dollar in consequence of an ill-advised attempt to prevent its depreciation as compared with gold.

Silver, it is true, has very recently fallen as low as 52½ pence; but this decline is exceptional and has been caused by the disturbance in the money market created by the payment of the French war indemnity of $963,000,000 and the subsequent attempt of Germany to relieve herself from a flood of depreciated silver coins by changing the metallic standard of value to gold. But this fall had been anticipated since the close of 1872, and could easily be predicted, since Germany during the last three years has been steadily selling silver and buying gold besides making extensive modifications in her paper currency.

But even admitting that Chevalier was manifestly wrong in his predictions, I contend that the bullionists of the present day with a more enlarged experience are not responsible for the errors in his calculations or the mistakes in his theory. A theory is merely useful as a mode of collecting and classifying facts, and the generalized principle derived therefrom may be partially or totally incorrect and yet the observed facts may still remain true. The motions of the planets were calculated with wonderful accuracy under the decidedly erroneous hypothesis that the earth was the center of the cosmical system, and even the correct Newtonian theory was not at first entirely satisfactory, because it did not explain all the phenomena of the motions of the heavenly bodies. In the same way Chevalier's theory in regard to a metallic standard has required modifications, and that eminent political economist, while correctly contending that the increased production of gold would alter its relative value as compared with silver, did not take sufficiently into account the probability that the search for other sources of supply of the less precious metal would be stimulated. He did not estimate at its full extent a wonderful power existing everywhere in nature, to wit—the conservation of an equilibrium of forces. A striking illustration of this principle has occurred within our own experience. The leaders of the southern confederacy placed their dependence upon King Cotton as a power sufficiently strong to compel the recognition of their new government and to disturb the commercial relations between the North and Europe. And yet how mistaken were they in their calculations. Fresh supplies of cotton were furnished by Egypt and India, and the balance of trade was maintained by the shipment of a totally-unanticipated product, coal-oil.

I shall now turn my attention to the theory recently advanced in this House, that "money is a national institution, depending upon the decrees of government, and that this is equally true whether it be of gold, of silver, or of paper." And here let me refer to the "Speeches of Sir Robert Peel" for that eminent statesman's elaborate exposition of the currency question in the debates in the House of Commons in 1844, on the Bank of England charter act; and if, after a careful study of this valuable and exhaustive treatise, the friends of paper money as a national institution are not converted from the error of their ways their sins will only be forgiven on the ground of invincible ignorance.

Among the various sophistical definitions of the standard of value condemned by Peel will be found the following: "The standard of value is neither gold nor silver, but it is something set up in the imagination to be regulated by public opinion." And this definition corresponds very nearly with one of the financial heresies recently advocated in this House. On the other hand, I hold that, according to practice, according to law, according to the ancient monetary policy of this country, a promise to pay a dollar means an express engagement to pay a certain definite quantity of gold or silver with a mark upon it to determine its weight and fineness, and can mean nothing else.

The doctrine that a promise to pay a dollar is satisfied by the delivery of a piece of paper bearing a renewed promise to pay another dollar "when convenient," or, as one may say, "next day after never," would be considered by every one as sheer nonsense; and yet it is not a particle more absurd than the proposition that Congress can direct that a slip of paper bearing the legend "This is a dollar" shall be received as a full acquittance of the obligation. Common sense repudiates such a proposition, and it need only be stated or applied to other ordinary transactions of life to be rejected as visionary. The illustrations of its absurdity are numerous, and the ridiculous results of its practical application are obvious to the meanest capacity. And yet the "baggage-check" illustration is gravely propounded as a solution of our present financial difficulties.

I am yet to learn that a common carrier, no matter how high his credit may be, will hold himself responsible for a trunk "containing tens of thousands of dollars" without a special written contract, or that a traveler without other evidence of property than a baggage-check alone can recover the value of his trunk even to the extent of $100, the limitation placed by the common carrier on his liability. But the illustration does not present a parallel case. According to our modern theorists the promise to deliver the trunk, as implied by the check, would be satisfied by the delivery of another circle of brass covered with letters and numbers, and so on indefinitely, while the unfortunate traveler in the search after his clothes would at last be reduced to the condition of Adam and Eve before the fall. Such arguments and such illustrations are very nearly akin to the theory of "Micawber" or the first republican candidate for President, who actually believed he had paid his old debts by signing new promissory notes which he never intended to pay.

The advocates of an inconvertible currency contend that "standards are fixed, do not fluctuate, are not given to vicissitudes, and do not vary," and that the precious metals, as they do not rigidly fulfill these conditions in every respect, should on that account be rejected and an entirely arbitrary measure of value should be adopted. This notion as to the absolute invariability of a standard is a mistaken one. No man at all acquainted with the history of gold and silver and with the effect of new sources of supply could be so foolish as to assert that the precious metals constitute an absolutely invariable standard of value. The only requisites are that the standard shall not be liable to violent and sudden changes, and that something must actually exist in nature with which it can be compared. Hence the advocates of paper money do not by any means prove their position by showing that gold and silver have fallen within the last three hundred years. These facts are not denied, and time is wasted in proving them. But it has never been proved that gold and silver have become absolutely worthless like inconvertible paper money which rests on an ideal basis.

This Government has always recognized for its units something that exists in nature and something that can be replaced in case of the total destruction of the standards. It has enacted that the dollar shall be one seven-millionth part of 23,220 avoirdupois pounds of pure gold; that the avoirdupois pound shall be equal to the weight of 27.72738 cubic inches of water, and that the inch shall be the thirty-ninth part of a pendulum beating seconds at London. All these units can be ascertained by mechanical means, while new measures would only depend upon a different subdivision of these standards or on the arbitrary will of a body of men changing every two years. Congress has no more power to alter these generally accepted standards than it has to alter the ratio of the diameter of a circle to its circumference. Both attempts would be equally futile.

There is, then, no real standard of value but gold and silver, and the pressing question before us is, how shall we return to that standard? The republicans of Ohio and the democrats of Pennsylvania, in State convention, have both recently adopted resolutions declaring that gold and silver are the only true basis for the currency of the Republic, and that Congress should take such steps for the resumption of specie payments as will most surely reach that result without destroying the business interests of the people. What those steps ought to be I shall now endeavor to show by a practical application of the principles acted upon by the governments of other great commerical countries.

The immense issues of irredeemable bank and State notes during the twenty-five years of war succeeding the outbreak of the French revolution had reduced the finances of the nations of Europe to a deplorable condition, and after a long series of commercial disasters, an attempt was made in Great Britain in 1844 under the lead of Sir Robert Peel to remedy the evils of a depreciated currency. Other nations adopted his plan and followed his guidance—some very closely and others remotely. Great Britain alone, by strenuously resisting the war mania, and by keeping her expenses within her receipts, succeeded in regaining her former prosperity. And the other nations, so long as they rigorously pursued the financial policy of Great Britain, gave signs of returning health. But foreign and domestic wars broke out, and in the attempt to pursue hostilities and crush insurrection, a mighty volume of irredeemable paper currency was issued and the result was national bankruptcy, only relieved for the time by national repudiation and dishonor. The remedy proposed by Sir Robert Peel in 1844 was to maintain a certain definite proportion between the issues of paper and the metallic resources of the Bank of England, (the agent of the government,) and of the joint-stock and private banks.

This policy is to allow a certain fixed issue of notes covered by securities and commercial paper, and to require that every note above that fixed issue shall be covered by gold in equal amount. Under this system the circulation of the United Kingdom for the month ending December 25, 1875, was as follows: Fixed issues, £30,564,750 sterling; actual circulation, £46,121,460 sterling. The metallic reserve for the same period was: Bullion in the Bank of England, £23,051,862; specie in the Scotch and Irish banks, £8,108,162; making a total of £31,161,024, or 67.6 per cent. of the circulation. The Bank of England alone, with a fixed circulation of £15,000,000, had a paper circulation of £27,164,751, with a bullion reserve of £23,051,862, or nearly 85 per cent. These figures speak for themselves and need no comment.

We next come to Germany; and it will be sufficient to state that the Imperial Bank, which, January 1, 1876, replaced the Bank of Prussia and fifteen German private banks, had, according to the latest returns, a circulation of 735,700,000 marks, covered by metal amounting to 438,000,000 marks, or 59½ per cent. By the imperial bank act, the margin between the note circulation and the bullion must not exceed 250,000,000 marks; but the figures just quoted show a margin of 297,700,000, and the excess of 47,700,000 marks is taxable at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum; this method having been adopted to regulate the paper currency.

France at present, owing to the disasters of 1870, is a non-specie paying country; but the returns for the Bank of France and its branches, the only banks of issue in France, show that January 28, 1875, the circulation amounted to 2,641,081,935 francs and the metallic reserve to 1,354,000,000 francs, or over 51 per cent., the maximum of circulation permitted by the law of July 15, 1872, being 3,200,000,000 francs. The council-general of the bank is endeavoring to withdraw from circulation the notes for five and for twenty francs, (there are no ten-franc notes issued,) and to replace them with gold and silver coins, so as to compensate exactly for the diminution of "fiduciary money" by the increase of "metallic money."

Austria, after a long career of almost hopeless bankruptcy, has finally recovered herself partially, and from the returns of the Austrian national bank of the business of 1875 it appears that the circulation during that year amounted to 286,242,333 gulden, covered by 134,416,894 gulden in metal, the notes on the average for the whole year being covered by 47 per cent. of metal.

Russia also has passed through a condition of insolvency, and in 1860 an Imperial Bank was established. On December 31, 1870, there were in circulation 716,000,000 rubles of state notes, against which there was a metallic reserve in bank of 150,000,000 rubles, or nearly 20 per cent. The notes, however, were at a discount of 20 per cent. as compared with silver. No man, it is said, has a right to go to the treasury and ask for gold or silver for his notes, and the coin in circulation is copper.

The next illustration is Brazil, a country which enjoys the blessing of an irredeemable paper currency, where the money is a purely national institution depending on the decrees of government. The "mark weight" of standard gold or silver has year after year been divided into a greater number of reis, and the paper milreis which was worth 60 pence in 1821 is through gradual depreciation worth now only 27 pence at par. The gold "half joe," which in 1821 was valued at 6,400 reis, was by law in 1833 raised to 10,000 reis, and with singular inconsistency the figures 6,400 still appear on the coin. Brazil is famous as a gold-producing country, but the yield of the mines is exported uncoined. Small ingots of gold formed from the dust washed from the auriferous sands are assayed at the mint, but are not allowed to be exported. The coinage is very small, only averaging $60,000 per annum forty years ago and the amount now is still less. The government paper currency in circulation May 24, 1875, amounted to 168,744,299 milreis or $92,809,694, and the notes of the Brazilian bank amounted to about $18,000,000 more, all irredeemable in fact; and yet the United States minister at Rio, believing that the standard of value is created by government decree, gravely announces the issue of more paper as the panacea for the financial crisis.

As a last illustration of the value of a fictitious standard I shall cite the Turkish piastre, which, from being worth 60 cents in 1764, has been gradually debased until the value is not over 4½ cents. But I shall not linger upon the subject; for in consequence of the rapid depreciation of the currency the coinage presents an intricate study, and one scarcely worth the pains except to a Turk.

The history of the finances in all these countries presents examples to be imitated as well as those to be avoided, but the mutations of the currency in Austria particularly afford the most useful lessons in regard to the necessity of maintaining a fixed proportion between the paper circulation and the metallic reserve. Time fails me to give the full particulars, but it is sufficient to state that in 1811 the outstanding irredeemable notes amounted to 1,060,793,653 florins, worth only from one-eighth to one-twelfth of their face value. By an imperial decree this paper was redeemed at the rate of five dollars for one in new redemption notes called "Vienna-value paper money." The circulation was thus reduced to 212,158,731 florins; but by 1816 the paper money had again increased immensely, reaching 678,692,838 florins. This was reduced to two-fifths of its nominal value, or 271,477,135 florins. The state had thus made two bankruptcies in five years, and the actual reduction in that time on the old notes was from 100 to 8. The subsequent financial history of Austria is full of remarkable crises caused by the immense floods of paper money poured upon the country at the time of the insurrection of 1848, the Italian war of 1859, and the war with Prussia in 1866.

We ourselves have passed through similar crises during the last fifteen years, and their lessons should not be forgotten.

From these illustrations it has been proved that a paper circulation must be covered by a certain percentage of specie, and that unless this proportion be maintained the currency, although accredited by Government, will rapidly depreciate. As long ago as 1838 Daniel Webster laid it down as an unquestionable truth that no paper could be made equal and kept equal to gold and silver but such as is convertible into gold and silver on demand. And to check the excessive issue of paper, he held that a fixed proportion must be maintained between specie and circulation.

I shall now turn my attention to the financial condition of this country. On November 1, 1875, the outstanding circulation was as follows:

National-bank notes		$345,586,902
Notes of national gold banks		2,630,000
		348,216,902
Legal-tenders	$373,236,244
Fractional currency	40,681,629
Old demand notes	69,707
		413,987,580
		762,204,482

The United States bonds held November 1, 1875, to secure the redemption of circulating notes amounted to—

Bonds.	Principal.	Interest.
5 per cent. bonds	$239,046,200	*$11,952,310
6 per cent. bonds	115,688,700	*6,941,322
Pacific Railroad 6 per cent. bonds	12,814,512	†768,871
Total	367,549,412	19,662,503

*Gold. †Currency.

The national banks therefore received during the year ending November 1, 1875, the sum of $18,893,632 in gold and $768,871 in currency as interest on the bonds deposited to secure their note issues.

On October 1, 1875, the specie and legal representatives of specie in the national banks amounted to $8,050,330, divided as follows: United States coin certificates, $4,485,760; coin, $3,364,570, and coin checks, $200,000. The amount of specie, however, was unusually small, being below the average.

After comparing these statistics with the amount of paper currency afloat in the specie-paying countries of Europe, the irresistible conclusion must be arrived at that it is impossible for so vast an amount as seven hundred and sixty millions of intrinsically worthless money, so called, to circulate among a nation of forty millions of people and preserve its gold value. In fact, it is astonishing that our paper circulation has maintained itself so well. Its rapid depreciation has been prevented by reason of the vast resources of the nation and the firm faith of the people in the honesty and stability of the Government.

The remedy for the existing state of financial depression cannot easily be discovered or applied. It has been shown that the lowest metallic reserve or guarantee of notes in any specie-paying country is 59 per cent., and that France, with a specie guarantee of 51 per cent., has not yet attempted to resume. The council-general, or board of directors, of the Bank of France recommends a contraction of the paper issues by the withdrawal of the five-franc and the twenty-franc notes, and by the substitution of specie in their place. The very able financiers of that republic are therefore carrying out a system of contraction before resumption is attempted.

In considering the financial condition of this country, therefore, the important datum to be ascertained is the ratio which the metallic guarantee bears to the circulation. And we here are met with the astonishing fact that, no matter how large the amount of coin and bullion held by the national banks and by the United States Treasury may be, yet not a single dollar of real, substantial money is pledged for the redemption of the paper circulation.

As security for the payment of the notes of the national banks these corporations deposit with the United States Treasurer United States bonds whose market value must exceed the circulation by one-ninth of the issue, and they must also deposit in lawful money 5 per cent. of the circulation for the redemption of the mutilated notes, and must also keep constantly on hand from 15 to 25 per cent. of their deposits. All reports of the condition of the banks must therefore have reference chiefly to their ability to meet the demands of the depositors; but even these reports are unsatisfactory since it is simply impossible to obtain an accurate comprehensive statement of the condition of the paper currency in its relation to gold on any given day. The Secretary of the Treasury does not attempt to furnish such a statement, nor can the information be compiled from the reports of his subordinates, for the tables giving the bank and treasury returns are made up to different quarter days, and sufficient discrimination in regard to the movements of the coin is not exercised. Thus, for instance, the amount of gold sold by the Secretary is not stated, but only the premium obtained, and there is no estimate as to the actual amount of coin required for the operations of the Treasury, an amount evidently much smaller than the total sums received and paid out during the entire year.

I must therefore base my argument upon data furnished by the Treasury returns of the bank and legal-tender paper in circulation, which, November 1, 1875, amounted to $759,574,482, without a cent of real metallic guarantee. This volume of paper, I believe, is far beyond our business needs, and, with the experience of other countries as to the relative proportions which must be maintained between the fiduciary and the metallic money, I am justified in asserting that the only feasible plan for returning to specie payments is to reduce the amount of notes now in circulation.

I am well aware that this suggestion will encounter great resistance from the debtor class, and that even those who agree with me as to the imperative necessity of contraction will dissent from my views as to the mode in which it can be effected. An easy and rapid way would be to reduce the paper currency to $500,000,000 either by retiring the national-bank notes or by funding the legal-tenders, or by carrying on both operations at once until the required limit is reached.

The partial substitution of "lawful money" for national-bank notes would in my judgment be a desirable mode of contraction; and by this plan the Government would save no inconsiderable sum in the payment of interest. As the true policy seems to be to retire either the bank-notes or the legal-tenders, would not a currency emanating directly from the Government be preferable to one issued through the instrumentality of banking corporations?

Of course it will be said that the Government should not engage in banking. This objection is answered by the fact that the Government has been and still is engaged in that business, and that it is the legitimate province and high prerogative of government to supply the nation with a circulating medium—whatever that medium be composed of, whether gold and silver purely or mixed issues.

Another means of contraction and resumption advocated by many is to retire the legal-tenders by funding, and also to establish a system of free banking on the security of a deposit of Government bonds. This plan has much to recommend it, as it would also relieve the Government from the cost of keeping up an immense Engraving and Printing Bureau with its very expensive and complicated machinery, and would remove a fruitful source of peculation. The most certain way out of the dilemma would probably be to organize the free banks as specie-paying institutions with an ample reserve in metallic currency. I assume that under a system of free banks a total metallic guarantee of $300,000,000 would allow the circulation of $500,000,000 in paper—the sum probably required to supply the business wants of the commercial community. The ratio of 60 per cent. between metal and paper would be preserved, and the institutions, according to the experience of European countries, would be strong enough to pay their notes and to satisfy all the demands upon them for specie.

Either one or the other of these two plans will finally have to be adopted. The wild theories of the inflationists must be abandoned or the country will go from bad to worse. Our present system of finance must certainly contain some radical error, else our young and vigorous country with its vast resources would not have fallen into a state of decay, and our people would not have been reduced to a more distressed condition than that of the over-populated states of the Old World. The Pacific States and Territories in 1875 mined at least $75,000,000 of the precious metals, and in 1876 will doubtless yield $100,000,000 in about equal proportions of gold and silver, and the entire country is rich in everything requisite to insure prosperity and happiness; and is it not strange to see such a country groaning under want and depression?

The late civil war cost the people of the United States not less than $10,000,000,000 and five hundred thousand lives, and we are now paying $30,000,000 annually in pensions to the men who risked their lives to maintain the integrity of the Republic; and even these vast sacrifices sink into insignificance when compared with the tears, sorrows, and sufferings the war has entailed on the present generation. All this was undergone through love of country; and now, when comparatively a trifling sacrifice is necessary to return to an honest financial system, as much clamor is raised as if something terrible and hitherto unheard of was about to befall us.

Is it not strange indeed that the people who twelve years ago patiently endured so much, should now be unwilling to submit to slight inconveniences in the effort to be honest? Is not this state of affairs merely the result naturally produced by the baleful influence of an irredeemable paper currency?

THIRD-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to occupy the time or attention of the committee long, but I propose to call attention for a few moments to that branch of the postal service which has reference to third-class mail matter, and I trust that I shall be concise in what I have to say. By an act of Congress of June 8, 1872, mail matter was divided into three classes, substantially as follows:

First class: Written correspondence; practically, letters and postal cards.
Second class: Printed matter regularly sent out at stated periods from known offices of publication; practically, newspapers, magazines, and reviews mailed to regular subscribers.
Third class: Miscellaneous printed matter and other articles declared mailable by law; practically, pamphlets, occasional publications, transient newspapers and magazines, handbills, posters, unsealed circulars, prospectuses, books, manuscripts for publication, proof-sheets, revises, maps, prints, engravings, blanks, patterns, samples of merchandise, cards, envelopes, photographs, seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, scions, &c., all obscene publications being excluded.

There was fixed by the act of 1872 on that class of mail matter a postage rate of one cent for every two ounces, with the exception that books and samples of metals, ores, minerals, and merchandise had a double rate. By the act of 1874 that exception which I have just mentioned was taken away, and all mailable matter of the third class was put at the rate of one cent for every two ounces.

At the last session of the Forty-third Congress the question of raising the postage on third-class mail matter was mooted, but there was nothing done in either House to raise the rate; and on the last night of the last session, or rather on the last day of the session, near its close, I remember asking one of the members of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads whether or not the rate on third-class mail matter had been changed. I was informed that it had not. Several members made the same inquiry and received the same answer, and you may very well imagine the astonishment that was experienced by all a day or two after, when we discovered that the rate upon third-class mail matter had actually been doubled.

The matter came up again at the beginning of this session, and the subject was referred by the Postmaster-General to Mr. Bangs, superintendent of railway service, for information. Mr. Bangs, in a long letter which he wrote, addressed to the Postmaster-General, explains at length the whole question, and gave tabular statements showing the effect as to the cost and the revenue derived from carrying different classes of mail matter. In making his statement he acknowledged the fact that it was exceedingly impolitic in Congress to change the rate in regard to certain kinds of third-class mail matter, and especially that part of it which had reference to the dissemination of information among the people; but he insisted that the rest of the third-class mail matter should be left at the rate that it then was; that is, at one cent per ounce.

Now, it is very generally acknowledged by every statesman in the land that the dissemination of information among the people is one of the most important duties of the Government; that there should be as wide a dissemination of knowledge as possible; that it should be promulgated as extensively over the country as mails can take it; and that every facility for giving to each citizen all the information possible should be freely extended, even although it may cost the Government some money to do it; for intelligence is the life and soul of free institutions, and without it they must fail. He therefore urged upon the Postmaster-General that that portion of the third-class mail matter which referred to the dissemination of knowledge among the people should be left at the rate at which it had been before the passage of the law of last session. He contended, however, that the remaining portion of the mail matter of the third class, which consisted of merchandise of various kinds, should not be allowed to go through the mails except at the rate at which it stands to-day; that is, at a cent an ounce.

Now, I am unable to draw a distinction between them, and do not see why the mails should not carry that kind of merchandise at the same rates as the kind first mentioned for the benefit of the large portion of the community who are engaged in agriculture, and which amounts to more than 54 per cent. of the whole population. This portion of our people now receives seeds, scions, bulbs, roots, and things of that character through the mails under the law. The beneficent operation of the law of 1874 in this respect has encouraged a new kind of industry in the country, which is now becoming very extensive and which is being enlarged all over the land; I mean the dissemination of seeds, bulbs, scions, roots, and cuttings through the mails by the florists, horticulturists, and agriculturists in the different portions of the Republic. There are hundreds of thousands of dollars, I think I might safely say that there are millions of capital invested in that industry. In the northern districts of New York there are several very extensive establishments that are sending out several thousand dollars' worth every day of seeds, roses, and plants of one kind or another, which are sent to all parts of the United States where the express companies would not carry them.

The same business is rapidly extending through the Middle and Southern States. Eastern Pennsylvania has many such establishments in successful operation, and a large portion of their business is transacted through the mail. The mail carries that kind of merchandise far beyond the reach of the operations of the express companies. It is, therefore, the means of disseminating among all classes of the farming community new seeds, plants, scions, and fruits, and carries those valuable productions, many of them of new species, into places that never knew them before. In addition to that, it is valuable to all other classes of citizens in this, that it enables individuals far away from express companies' offices to receive through the mail small parcels of merchandise from the great cities which they otherwise would not obtain. These classes of agricultural and other merchandise are put up in small bags, boxes, or parcels, not exceeding four pounds each, are easily and quickly handled, and, as Mr. Bangs says in his letter of February 18, 1875, "are less expensive, piece for piece or pound for pound, than either first or second class mail."

The returns of the Post-Office Department show that a very large amount of that kind of matter is carried in the mails, far exceeding the amount of second-class matter, which consists of periodical publications, such as newspapers, magazines, &c. Now, it is a matter of great convenience, almost a matter of necessity, to large numbers of individuals living in remote portions of this great nation to have this opportunity afforded them, and it is afforded them at a much cheaper cost to the Post-Office Department of the Government than is required by the second-class mail matter.

To show the difference between the cost of the carriage of first-class mail matter and that of the second and third classes, I will take the statement of Mr. Bangs himself, in which he gives the weight of the different kinds of mail matter, the revenue derived from them, and the expense of carriage. Of the first class there was carried during the last fiscal year 13,502,000 of pounds, from which the revenue derived was 77.6 per cent., and the expense of carrying was 47.7 per cent. Of the second class there was carried 55,783,832 pounds, the revenue from which was only 3.9 per cent., while the expense of carrying it was 24.7 per cent. Of the third-class mail matter there was carried 42,351,308 pounds, the revenue from which was 18½ per cent., and the expense of carrying was 27.6 per cent.

In his letter of February 18, 1875, to the Postmaster-General, just mentioned, he says: "At eight cents per pound the amount of third-class mail matter forwarded in the mails in 1874, would yield a revenue of over $4,000,000; but the actual revenue from third-class mail averages twelve cents per pound, ranging from 54.33 cents from unsealed circulars to 8.2 cents from books, (the excess arising from fractional parts,) yielding the Department from third-class mail matter a revenue of about $6,000,000." This is rather more favorable to third-class matter than his letter of last December.

Therefore, if it be proper in the light of revenue or of usefulness to the people to carry second-class mail matter, much more is it proper to carry third-class mail matter, because it yields more revenue to the Government and is of equal utility in its way. Comparing the second and third classes, it appears that the second-class mail matter yielded a revenue of only about 4 per cent., in fact only 3.9 per cent., while the third-class mail matter, being more than eleven millions of pounds less than the amount of second-class mail matter, yielded a revenue of 18½ per cent., almost three times as much as the revenue yielded by the second-class matter, while the expense of carrying was only 27 per cent. So, as a matter of revenue alone, there is more reason why this third-class mail matter should be carried at the expense of the Government than that the second-class should.

Then let me say, in addition to what I have already said, the law as it stands to-day operates unequally and severely upon a large portion of the producers of and dealers in that class of merchandise of which I have spoken, and in which the agricultural community is interested. For instance, along the northern boundary of New York and farther west on the Canada line there are individuals and companies of large capital extensively engaged in the business of sending to all parts of the country floral catalogues, seeds, scions, bulbs, cuttings, roots, &c. They have an advantage over all persons in the same business in the Middle and Southern States of this country by virtue of the international postal treaty between Canada and the United States. On the 27th day of January, 1875, a postal treaty was made between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, the first article of which provides—

That correspondence of every kind, written and printed, embracing letters, postal cards, newspapers, pamphlets, magazines, books, maps, plans, engravings, drawings, photographs, lithographs, and patterns and samples of merchandise, including grains, seeds, &c., mailed in the United States and addressed to Canada, or, vice versa, mailed in Canada and addressed to the United States, shall be fully prepaid at the domestic postage rates of the country of origin, and the country of destination will receive, forward, and deliver the same free of charge."

In Canada the rate of postage on third-class mail matter is four cents per pound, while in this country it is sixteen cents per pound. The treaty is taken advantage of in this way: The company or individual engaged in this kind of business of whom I have spoken has nothing to do but to cross the line and deposit his circulars, seeds, and whatever else of that class he may desire to send, in a Canadian post-office, with postage prepaid at the rate of four cents a pound, and it will then go into any part of the United States postage free. But a person or company in the same kind of business who mails his circulars, seeds, cuttings, roots, and bulbs, in the United States must pay postage thereon in advance at the rate of sixteen cents per pound. I will give a practical illustration of how that works. There is a man living near Toronto of the name of Brown, who sends out his circulars of Canadian forest-tree seeds, one of which I hold in my hand, in which circular he gives a price-list of them, and at the bottom of the circular says:

Seeds can be shipped to all points by express or by mail in packages not exceeding five pounds in weight at the rate of only four cents per pound to any part of the United States.

I have also, taken from the Country Gentleman, published at Albany, New York, this advertisement:

SEEDS.—Rennie's catalogue of field, garden, and flower seeds, &c., is now ready for mailing (free) to all applicants.

The new international postal arrangements enable my sending of seed parcels, &c., to any post-office throughout the United States at the rate of one cent for four ounces, (four cents per pound,) prepaid postage.

WILLIAM RENNIE,
Toronto, Canada.

Again, I find the following paragraph headed "Cheapening the postage," in the New York Times:

The Toronto Globe says: "A Detroit seed firm recently moved six and a half sacks of its catalogues to Windsor, Ontario, and there mailed them to persons in the United States, saving $3,170 by the transaction, or cheating the United States revenue, as some call it, out of that amount. The charge for what is known as 'third-class mail matter' in the United States is four times as much as is charged for the same class in Canada. Under the late postal arrangement between the two countries, the United States and Canada each agree to take charge of the other s mails without charge. Hence the Detroit transaction."

Thus it is that by this postal arrangement the firms or individuals dealing in those articles along the Canada line can transmit through the United States their circulars and seeds at one-fourth the postage which must be paid by those engaged in the same business in the Middle, Southern, and Western States, and our Government must carry foreign merchandise for foreigners or American merchandise for favored citizens at one-fourth the price usually paid by our people. I am not in favor of such reciprocity, as it is against our Government and the individual citizen. I say, therefore, that in order to equalize this matter as far as possible we should put the rate of postage down to where it was before the act of 1875; that is, one cent for every two ounces or fraction thereof. In so doing we shall be better able to equalize the rates between different parts of the country and to give equal advantage to persons engaged in the same line of business.

It is right and proper for me to say here, however, that the attention of the postmaster-general of Canada was called to this matter, and he promised to regulate it; but while the postal treaty stands I am unable to see what control he can have over it, because it is a regulation established by law, and he has no right to change the law; and even if he tried to regulate it it could be easily evaded by an individual on the south side of the northern boundary line who wanted to send his seeds and catalogues free, having an agency on the other side of the line, and through that agency transmit these circulars, catalogues, seeds, and other third-class matter through the United States at the cheap rates already mentioned.

I therefore insist that this House ought to legislate properly on this matter; that we ought to return to the rates which existed before the enactment of 1875 was put into the sundry civil bill without the knowledge of any of the members of the House in all probability, except perhaps our committee of conference; for, if it had been known to the House, I am very sure, from the sentiment which prevailed here at the time, that such a bill could never have been passed in this body.

Now, who is there that objects to restoring the law to where it stood in 1874? If we should ask around this House whether any individual constituent had written to his member here to have the postal law retained as it is, I think I may say that scarcely any member, unless he be the representative of an express-company, would say that he had been asked to have the law kept where it is to-day.

I have had no one writing to me to ask that the law be maintained in its present form; on the contrary, I have had many persons writing to me complaining of the burden placed upon their particular industry by the present law. Of all the men who have come here to Congress there is none, so far as I can learn, who desires that the law shall be maintained at its present rates, save the express companies themselves, either by their own officers or directors or by their attorneys. These are the parties who were instrumental, as I have always understood, in having the law of 1874 changed to its present form. That change was wrought in a single paragraph—a short and simple one, which escaped the attention, in all probability, of the conference committee of the House—a paragraph, very innocent-looking in itself, inserted in the sundry civil appropriation bill, a place entirely foreign to its nature, and where no one would be likely to look for it. It reads as follows:

That section 8 of the act approved June 23, 1874, making appropriation for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, be amended, and the same is hereby amended, as follows: Insert the word "ounce" in lieu of the words "two ounces."

The effect of this change in the law was to make the act of 1874 read that that class of matter should be charged postage at the rate of one cent for each ounce instead of one cent for every two ounces, thus doubling the rate on third-class mail matter. This shows the danger of amendments in conference and the necessity of vigilance of conference committees.

I say, therefore, that the whole benefit that has arisen from that change of law has inured to the express-companies, and not to the public. There has been a tax of sixteen cents a pound additional imposed upon the reading public and the agricultural public on all mail matter of this class, with little, if any, additional benefit to the Government. Indeed the pecuniary advantage to the Government is but a poor equivalent for the disadvantage resulting to purchasers of merchandise and the readers of third-class mail matter and to the injury of both producers and receivers of the agricultural, horticultural, and floral matter allowed to be passed through the mail, and on which a double tax is imposed, and to be paid by one or the other parties interested in such mail matter.

I may also say that I see no good reason why the annual reports of universities, colleges, academies, and religious and beneficial associations, the catalogues of seedsmen, of florists, almanacs, and other annual publications of that character should not be rated as second-class matter, and carried at the rates provided therefor.

The Post-Office Department was organized in the interest of all the people; it was not intended as a money-making concern, and all the people should have all the benefit it can afford.

I am therefore satisfied that it would be right and proper for this House, whenever a vote is reached on the matter, to adopt the change in the classification that I have just mentioned, and to re-instate in the law for the rest of the third-class matter the rates provided by the act of 1874, and thus encourage the dissemination of information among the people and the transmission of the kinds of products and merchandise of which I have spoken before to places where they would not otherwise be entitled to go.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] what would be the effect of the restoration of the law as it was upon pamphlet publications issued by benevolent institutions? I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read a letter which I received a short time since, and which will explain itself.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHURCH EXTENSION ROOMS OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH,
Philadelphia, April 18, 1876.

DEAR SIR: I solicit your attention to the provisions of the postage law reported by Mr. HAMLIN and passed by the Senate. Our Church Extension Annual, (a copy of which I send you,) missionary reports, &c., will, under this bill, if it becomes a law, be subjected to six times as much postage as Harper's Magazine and similar publications. * * * Our Annuals should really be admitted as second class.

Yours, truly,

A. J. KYNETT.

Hon. WILLIAM LAWRENCE,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. LAWRENCE. That letter is from the Church Extension Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. It seems that the new law is exceedingly onerous with reference to the distribution of the annuals published by that organization and by similar benevolent associations of that and other churches. The general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States, now in session at Baltimore, adopted yesterday a resolution which I ask the Clerk to read, as showing the oppressive character of the existing law.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rev. H. Price, of Upper Iowa, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the benevolent corporations of our own and other churches engaged in various forms of missionary and educational work of recognized public necessity and value are expected and required to publish annuals giving valuable information for the people and send them to our pastors and others, and in so doing need to avail themselves of the Uni ed States mails; and whereas the postage on such annuals has, under the rulings of the Post-Office Department, for more than a year past been unjust and oppressive and almost prohibitory; and whereas the bill recently passed by the United States Senate proposes the continuance of such inequitable and oppressive rates by expressed provisions of law, thereby compelling these benevolent corporations to pay six times as much as other publishers are required to pay on similar printed matter of no more public benefit: Therefore,

"Resolved, That we respectfully but earnestly protest against the passage by the House of Representatives of the bill recently passed by the Senate with this unjust provision included, and we do hereby respectfully memorialize Congress to so modify the postal laws that the annuals published by our benevolent corporations may pass through the mails at the same rates of postage that other publishers are required to pay on monthly and quarterly magazines."

The mover was appointed a committee of one to transmit a copy of this protest to the House of Representatives at Washington.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I will answer as far as I can the inquiry of my friend from Ohio. The interpretation of the Post-Office Department with regard to annuals, catalogues, seeds, plants, and things of that kind, matters which go out only once a year—and this appears to be an annual publication—are classified as third-class mail matter, paying one cent an ounce or sixteen cents a pound; whereas second-class mail matter, such as newspapers and magazines regularly published, pay at the rate of two cents a pound. That is my understanding of the law.

Mr. LAWRENCE. That is the existing law?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir. I do not know how the bill is as it came from the Senate.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The old law before this change was made at the last session of Congress would pass these annuals at the same rate as second-class mail matter.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I do not so understand it. I do not know what was the interpretation before the act of 1875, but I do know that under the act of 1875 they claimed such periodicals came under third-class mail matter and paid sixteen cents a pound, while newspapers and magazines paid eighteen cents.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to call attention to the subject now, so that when this bill shall again come before the House this manifest injustice may be remedied. It does seem to me these annuals, including, as my friend from Pennsylvania has said, catalogues of seeds and fruit-trees, almanacs, annuals of missionary societies and benevolent institutions, as well as catalogues of colleges and universities, and all similar matter, should go in the mails at the same rate of ordinary magazines of the country. I know no reason why this discrimination should be made against them. A simple statement of the fact is sufficient to demonstrate the injustice of the discrimination made against them by existing law. And while we are upon this subject, or when we shall be upon it for action, I hope such remedy will be applied as will give to this class of mail matter the same advantage which applies to ordinary monthly magazines.

I desire to state further, Mr. Chairman, that there is no subject of legislation upon which I have received during this session of Congress so many letters demanding a change in the existing law as I have upon this subject of a change in the postal law. They come up from every city and every town almost in my district and from almost every interest of the country. The large manufacturing establishments which send out advertising newspapers, published for the sole purpose of advertising their goods, their wares, their commodities, are charged enormous rates, and in this respect there ought to be a remedy. This demand for a change in the law, as my friend from Pennsylvania has said, comes from nursery-men who desire to send out cuttings, and seeds, and bulbs to remote localities where the express companies do not travel. The effect of existing law is almost to exclude such matters from the mails.

It is a most marvelous thing, Mr. Chairman, but nevertheless true, that where a great monopoly, as these express companies are, once gains an advantage by law it is almost impossible to remedy it. I have been amazed during the years I have been in Congress at the power these companies are capable of exercising and how deaf, I was about to say, Congress seems to be when appeals are made on behalf of the whole people. I trust the appeal which is now made, coming up so loudly from all parts of the country, for relief against a measure almost smuggled through during the last session of Congress, in the interest of express companies, will be heard. It is high time the people should assert their interest against these vast monopolies, and it is high time these vast monopolies should cease to make demands which outrage the public judgment and are hostile to the public interest. I am the friend of corporations; they are vast agencies for good; but in order that they may continue to be agencies for good, in order that they may not provoke hostile legislation beyond what would be reasonable and just, they ought not to make demands upon Congress which are so manifestly wrong as that which now seems to be persisted in by these express companies, and which seems to find, I am sorry to say, so many supporters at least in one end of the Capitol. I hope that policy of wrong against the people will find but few friends in this end of the Capitol.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me say a word. I want to commend in the strongest language the action of the gentleman from Ohio, which has always been against undue encroachments on the part of these corporations, and especially his zeal in this regard. At the same time, I want to remind him and the House that one of the first acts of this House when we came together at the beginning of this session was to repeal the offensive legislation which he has just told you was smuggled last session into an appropriation bill. The other end of the Capitol, to which he has also alluded, is the sole responsible legislative party for the continuance of this great outrage on the people.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I believe that is true.

RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, I shall claim the attention of the Committee of the Whole House on this occasion to express the sentiments which impress me in the discussion of a subject it is my hope may be regarded as within the legitimate consideration of the committee, and yet a part of which I am conscious is not specifically connected with any measures now pending before Congress.

I propose to express briefly my views in regard to

as applicable to our democratic or republican theory, and from it, if successful, shall hope to deduce something of practical benefit in the legislation before us.

I express, sir, no novel sentiment in the declaration that our democratic theory is in its essential elements a revolutionary movement in governments in conflict with the theories of the great body of the nations of the world.

These nations, supported by the prestige of long usage, recognize hereditary authority, "the divine right of kings;" power acquired by the accident of birth; a single sovereign, and he or she not such by virtue of eminent qualifications or of patriotic devotion to the public good, but as a right hereditary, by virtue of which the right to rule is confided to one person, while the millions composing the nation are the subjects, who, however gifted they may be or possessing whatever of superior ability, are the subjects of that rule.

This, sir, is in brief the theory of monarchical governments. And although, as is well known, in its application in many of the civilized nations it is limited in and divested of many of its severities, it is in the abstract, as before stated, the theory of the governments of the great body of the nations of the world.

Our democratic system revolutionizes this, and founds its claim to favorable recognition in a denial of this "hereditary authority," and asserts as its dogma of political faith that all "rightful and sovereign authority springs from and is vested in the people," thereby transposing the monarchical theory of a "single sovereign and he irresponsible, and millions of subjects and they responsible," into the system of "millions of sovereigns" having a few servants of their own selection, and they "responsible to them."

This grand conception of government framed by the founders of the Republic, it is ours to protect and preserve. I shall not attempt argument as to its correctness, but will assume that all concede it; nor shall I charge that any political organization or body of men in our country are intentionally disposed to thwart its legitimate application, or defeat its purposes; but will content myself with the expression that in my judgment we are gradually, yet certainly, drifting beyond and away from it.

The system demands the constant recognition of the sovereignty of the people, and of accountability to them by their servants, who as their agents (selected and chosen by them) exercise the functions of office in their name by virtue of their authority and for their good, the servant, from the highest to the lowest, realizing ever a constant and abiding responsibility to the people, and they as masters demanding always a strict compliance with the full measure of their rightful sovereign authority.

The fathers of our Republic not only understood our democratic theory, but studiously acted in conformity to it. As an example, I propose in this connection to present the administration of Mr. Jefferson, who is conceded to have been the master spirit in its inauguration.

Pervading every act and movement of his administration, there was the constant reminder of the sovereign authority of the people, and of the humility, accountability, and responsibility of the servant.

This he evinced unmistakably by the simple and unostentatious exercise of his official duties, acknowledging constantly in his every act to his countrymen that he was their servant, selected and commissioned by them to subserve their will, and to devote his best energies to their welfare, and not to subordinate his position to promote selfish ends or personal aggrandizement. Hence he discountenanced and banished from the executive office and the Executive Mansion all of the trappings and idle meaningless flummery of aristocratic pretensions, and substituted therefor the plain and simple, yet intelligent and dignified, demeanor and surroundings appropriate to the republican simplicity of a nation not only of freemen, but of sovereigns owning their own Government.

Appreciating fully his responsibility and accountability to the people, he spent during his presidential terms of office the greater portion of his time at the nation's capital, where with watchful vigilance he, as its head, could direct and control the executive administration, and, being at his post of duty, could prevent corruption and detect inefficiency on the part of the subordinate officials connected with the Government of which he had charge.

Residing at the nation's capital, with the Government archives at hand, he could direct and properly instruct its diplomatic representatives abroad, and also properly receive and confer with the accredited embassadors of the nations with which ours was on terms of political intercourse.

Recognizing his responsibility as a servant, he was extremely cautious in guarding against all approaches to secure patronage by designing men, who by interested kindnesses or valuable gifts might seek to ingratiate themselves into his favorable consideration for the selfish purpose of obtaining office, and which, when obtained, they would use to acquire fortunes for themselves by plundering the people's Treasury.

Conscious that he, like other men, was possessed of the passions and impulses of human nature, he knew that it was dangerous, when acting as the servant of the people, to allow himself to be patronized by the designing sharper. He would accept no gifts, and hence had no improper inducements to the granting of official favors, and therefore appointed none to office except those who based their claims on merit and who could successfully withstand rigid examination and sustain character thereby both for integrity and capability.

As President of the United States, and recognizing that he held that station as the servant of the people, with its duties to be discharged so as to promote their prosperity and happiness, and deeply sensible of the obligations thereby imposed, the selfish desire to enrich himself or by it to advance the fortunes of those connected with him by the ties of relationship could have no controlling influence over him.

Sir, he did not, and would not, appoint any of his relations or kindred to office. He did not believe that the various offices subject to his bestowment were his individual perquisities, nor subject to distribution by him among his kindred and personal favorites; but, on the contrary, he regarded them as simply committed to him in trust as the chief servant of the people, and that his duty was to dispense them in their interest to those, and to those only, to whom the public mind pointed as best fitted by experience, qualifications, and integrity to discharge the incumbent duties thereof with efficiency and fidelity.

In thus manifesting a knowledge of the character of his responsibility, and acting in conformity to it, we now, in reviewing the eminent success of his administration, readily realize that his was the only sure pathway of safety.

I would not argue, nor do I believe, that the reception of gifts, large or small, would have corrupted him. His was not the material from which corruption readily springs. But there was safety in putting himself in the position to assure the public that, in his selections, no taint of bribes or acknowledgment of personal favors received had any influence in the dispensation of the official patronage under him.

Neither would I assume that the public service would have materially, if at all, suffered by the bestowment of official stations upon his kindred or relations. On the contrary, it is but fair to presume that so pure and so great a man was hardly of a relationship or kindred of impure and corrupt men. Yet such a case was possible; and without the establishment of an unyielding and inflexible rule against it, it was possible for kindred ties to mislead, and the public welfare intrusted to him suffer through a human weakness indulged to gratify the importunities of a needy relationship.

And again, a wholesome public sentiment, ever indispensable in a free government, was to be conserved; and it might be difficult for him, even with his untarnished fame and high character for integrity, to satisfy that public sentiment that the reception of gratuities from friends, or the strong ties of kindred, had not induced or constituted some element of influence in his actions, rather than that they were controlled purely in the interests of the public.

His high station demanded an entire abnegation of self, and of all selfish influences, and an exalted, untrammeled effort in all things to meet the demands of the public will, and he was strong enough and patriotic enough faithfully to discharge its duties.

And as it was principle that prompted him, so it was with all of the early Chief Magistrates. The doctrine of "sovereign power in the people" and responsibility and accountability to them by the servant was a cardinal principle with all of them, to which high standard, faithfully acted up to, the safety and welfare of the Republic was assured.

But, unfortunately for us, in these later years we have been drifting away from these wholesome precepts and these good examples, and, as a result, the public sentiment is debauched, public morals corrupted, and mismanagement, misrule, and widespread demoralization permeate the whole body-politic.

Sir, I do not, and would not on this occasion and in this presence, make personal attacks. On the contrary, I would desire to treat fairly and deal kindly with all men in official or unofficial stations; would prefer, sir, and can with much reason, attribute the corruptions, frauds, and political demoralizations, which admittedly exist all around us to the rapidly growing tendency of a vicious system which has sprung up among us.

This system, sir, is simply a reverse of the good one that I have been describing. Officials now are beginning to feel that they are not responsible to the people as a sovereign power standing behind them, and whose sovereign will they are to obey, but rather that they of themselves are the legitimate sources of authority.

Should a chief magistrate feel thus, we could hardly expect of him an administration such as we have been describing. The master seldom obeys the behests of the subject. Nor is the irresponsible ruler likely to manifest any nice sense of duty or obedience toward those whose prerogative it is his to rule and control.

GOVERNED TOO MUCH.

And, now, sir, comparing the political tendencies of the present with those illustrating the administration of Mr. Jefferson, I venture the suggestion that it will be discovered that there is manifested now a growing, vicious tendency on the part of officials to govern too much, or, to express the same idea in another form, there is too little confidence in the ability of the people to govern, and consequently a disposition exhibited by political leaders to encroach upon their authority.

It appears to me, from the investigation that I have been able to give to this subject, that if the political actors who were contending for supremacy in the days of Jefferson and Hamilton were now on the political stage, the followers of Hamilton would witness in the present political action an exemplification of his principles.

Let us for a moment consider the basis upon which each of these eminent men founded their diverse theories. Jefferson, realizing that necessity was the author of progress, favored the imposition of the heaviest possible responsibilities upon the people, realizing that when responsibility was devolved upon them it created demand for thought and action, thereby developing higher qualifications and elevating the general standard of capacity. Hamilton, on the other hand, conservative and patristical in his views, doubted all radical encroachments on the theories of the past, and therefore advocated the retention of power in the few.

While Jefferson deprecated extensive or excessive legislation, for the fundamental reason that he desired the people for their own advancement and security to act freely, Hamilton, under the influence of opposite theories of Government, doubted their capacity and marshaled his forces across the pathway of progress.

To this divergence from the highways marked out and illustrated for us by Jefferson is, in my judgment, attributable the broad difference in the externals of public administration now and then, and the departure from the high standard of official morals that then justly entitled us to the respect and admiration of the world. To it is to be ascribed the corruptions that pervade all the social as well as political forms that enthrall us, the flippancy with which violations of the ballot-box, the people's emblem of power, are treated by the country, and the general political demoralizations that now justly subject republican institutions to adverse criticism by the advocates of the forms of government of the Old World.

I have, sir, thus far directed attention mainly to administrative or executive action. But the argument applies as forcibly to all other branches of Government; and, in fact, perhaps no department is so liable to abuse the sovereign will as the legislative.

Our early Congresses were composed of men who reverenced the Constitution, and conformed their actions strictly in obedience to the limitations of that instrument, and acted constantly with a full recognition of the principle that they were simply servants, not masters; that the sovereign power was lodged in those who elected and paid them, and that to it they were responsible and accountable.

Acting up to this standard, there was developed a class of membership which for integrity, ability, and moral uprightness challenged the respect and the admiration of the civilized world.

To be known in the early days of the Republic as a member of the American Congress was of itself an accredited passport of respectability among the good and the great wherever good and great men lived.

A Congress composed of men feeling that they were responsible and accountable servants of a sovereign constituency behind them, with the eyes of that constituency constantly upon them, could not and would not wantonly do an act in conflict with the sovereign will of that people as expressed in their Constitution.

Sir, a Congress of men who fully appreciate this idea, and who in the language of a distinguished gentleman of this House, "Salute the august majesty of the people," will not fail to protect, defend, and preserve free government.

A congress thus composed will not carelessly and recklessly vote away or appropriate the people's money or their landed heritage. With such a body unguarded, unconstitutional subsidies and grants of lands and money to overgrown, soulless corporations would be an impossibility.

Good servants as legislators, feeling their responsibility to their sovereign masters the people, could not and would not pass laws of a doubtful constitutionality; and specially would they guard against doing so when those laws involved the appropriation of large sums of money wrung from that people by onerous taxation.

With a Congress thus composed the disgraceful taint of a credit mobilier could have had no existence. Neither would the fury of a nation's anger have shaken the Republic with the indignant and peremptory demand for a repeal of a "salary grab." For the members of a Congress feeling ever their responsibility as the people's servants could not have been corrupted by the one nor have voted to make the other.

And now, sir, in attempting very briefly yet practically to present the result of these unfortunate tendencies, allow me to call attention to the character of legislation that has received and now engrosses a large portion of the time of Congress.

PROTECTIVE TARIFFS.

Every industry in which capital is invested is demanding that, in raising revenue, it is imperative that its interests shall receive protection against foreign competition; is declaring in effect that the great masses of the people represented in this country by the laborer and agriculturist must pay a toll to the few possessing money to the acknowledged detriment of the millions who do not possess it.

Our revenue legislation is largely predicated on this theory, which is clearly in hostility not only to the dictates of common justice, but to all of the cardinal principles of free government, for the reason that such legislation must result in dangerously concentrating capital, and therefore dangerously depositing power in the few.

And, further, the hardship against the consumer is in our case now aggravated by the unhappy condition of the public debt; being exempt from taxation the rich laggard and bondholder (not useful to the state) is enabled to draw all of his wealth from public support, while every member of society engaged in useful pursuits is compelled to bear, not only his own, but the rich man's portion of the public burden.

The theory of all revenue recovery under protective legislation being based upon consumption of necessaries, and not on property values, the laboring millions stagger under oppressive taxation, while the idle rich are its beneficiaries. It in effect imposes a penalty on labor and usefulness and offers a reward to idleness and wealth.

AMENDMENTS TO CONSTITUTION.

And again, sir, in the line of this excessive legislation, we have now presented for our consideration in the message of the President of the United States the adoption of constitutional amendments looking to the interference by the General Government with public education. In this we find the assertion of the same error, namely, that success lies in abridging the power of the people and in increasing the power of the servant. It in effect asserts that the few in authority are better qualified to determine a proper system of education than the whole people. This, allow me to say, is another dangerous aggression against their legitimate domain, the tendency of which is not only to multiply legislation and increase official stations, but further to consolidate power and augment the public expenditures.

SUMPTUARY LAWS.

Periodically an infatuation takes possession of the law-makers in our country demanding, as they fancy, the adoption of restraining legislation looking to the control by legal enactment of the habits and customs of the people. But, like the spasm upon the physical system, the influence of such legislation upon those affected by it is evanescent. They generally assert their authority in the end and disregard all coercive measures to dominate matters relating to their own tastes and personal comfort. Their results are only witnessed in statutes that are "dead letters," which are opposed and treated with contempt instead of respect and obedience.

The Maine law and its kindred legislation have had their day, and are remembered now only as disturbing elements of discord resulting ever in failure, for it is demonstrated now that all of this class of legislation can result in no good.

The wise and good men of the country have learned that it is only through the influence of example and moral suasion, the inculcation of correct principles, and individual efforts that the excesses here referred to can be legitimately and properly treated.

Every attempt in this age and in our country by fanatical, restrictive laws to stifle the people's conception of liberty, by whatever cause pretended to be justified, will, instead of promoting the purpose intended, produce only the opposite results.

FINANCIAL LEGISLATION.

Further, sir, proceeding upon the false hypothesis that the people are not wise enough to erect a monetary system to meet the demands of their own internal trade, national banks are established by authority of the General Government, through which all private enterprises in money pursuits are threatened with destruction by creating a monster monopoly that overthrows the health-giving influence of competition and subjects all of our industries of whatever character and all of our classes of whatever pursuit to the baleful influence of its decrees, by its operation consolidating money in a few hands and enabling them by its accumulation to control all the legitimate sources of wealth, and subordinating these money magnates to the central authority to do the bidding of those in power, which, if reposed in bad hands, is an efficient instrument to perpetuate their authority and to jeopardize and endanger public liberty.

At each recurring session of Congress legislation is pressed by the powerful influence of these national banks to secure their own perpetuation. Were it not for their existence our whole circulating medium would now be the non-interest-bearing legal-tender Treasury note, and the people would be relieved in the matter of interest of over twenty million dollars ($20,000,000) taxation annually. Through their instrumentality the Sherman resumption act was passed, which, if its objects be accomplished in withdrawing the legal-tender notes and substituting an interest-paying bond exempt from taxation therefor, will impose an additional annual interest burden of over twenty million dollars ($20,000,000,) and, further, not only substitute an interest-bearing for a non-interest-bearing debt, but make that debt a foreign in lieu of what is now a home or domestic debt, and cause an additional drain of the precious metals from our country to pay the interest thereon.

Were it not for the existence of these national banks the discriminations against the legal-tender notes would have long since been abolished, and they would have been made receivable for all dues, public and private, which, if done, it appears to me that their early appreciation in value to a sound standard would clearly follow.

But these national-bank corporations are interested in the depreciation of the legal-tenders in order to secure their retirement and the substitution of their own issue in place of them.

And now, sir, although it has been and may be charged that it is in conflict with democratic teachings to advocate a paper circulation as an abstract proposition, yet it seems to me that an exigency is upon us when a wise and honest statesmanship must, in the interests of the people, accept the situation as it exists and secure such legislation as looks most to the general welfare.

While it has been my endeavor to show that the national banks were destructive to private interests and dangerous to public liberty, the legal-tender circulation has neither an element of money accumulation nor of political centralization in its character. Issued directly from the Treasury it is diffused through the whole body of the people, the government having no control over its holders, the only danger that can be apprehended by the recognition of authority by the Government to issue as a circulating medium the legal-tender note being that under unwise legislation improper inflation may ensue. But in considering the two horns of this dilemma allow me here to assert that the recognition of such authority is a thousand-fold less dangerous to the public welfare and a thousand-fold more promotive of prosperity than the perpetuation of the national-banking system.

Sir, we hear the cry for hard money, and yet the mass of those apparently most earnest in its advocacy, session after session of Congress, vote in the interest of the perpetuation of national banks and national-bank circulation. Is it unjust then, sir, to charge that this hard-money cry is all a sham and a delusion? For hard money they present us with the national-bank note, entailing as its companion (if the resumption law be carried into effect) an annual interest burden of over forty million dollars ($40,000,000) against the people.

Sir, the authors of these hard-money fictions very well know that for the present, or within a period that can be defined with any certainty, hard money as a circulating medium, if desirable, is an impossibility.

To resume specie payments—meaning thereby, of course, gold payments, for the advocates of this theory demonetize silver—in a country admittedly demanding eight hundred to a thousand millions of dollars as a circulating medium to carry on the legitimate business, and less than one hundred and fifty millions of gold in the country, with the drain against us and no hope of borrowing, except at ruinous rates of interest, is a proposition so absurd, that it does not call for refutation. One of the hard-money advocates in the other branch of this Congress, (I refer to Hon. JOHN P. JONES, of Nevada,) in a speech delivered in the Senate on the 25th ultimo, used this language:

> Resumption in gold is out of the question. It is not practical financially; it is not practical metallurgically; it is not practical internationally; it is not practical politically; in short, it is not practical at all.

This is strange language to come from one of a class who speak of the current legal-tender notes of the Government as "irredeemable rags," and yet it is forced from their sagacious statesmen when they are compelled to meet this question fairly as a logical fact.

And again, sir, is it not a well-known fact that in any condition of a commercial people in any country coin can only be the absolute basis of values, and, to a limited extent, the circulating medium? Not to exceed one-tenth part of all cash business transactions are accomplished by its transfers. Drafts, checks, bills of exchange, letters of credit, and a paper currency perform nearly all of its offices with greater facility and economy. Hence, in my judgment, as a solution of the financial difficulties surrounding us, the prime objects to be now attained are:

First, the immediate and unconditional

the demand for which by the people was emphatically registered against such legislation by the election of a democratic House of Representatives and the defeat of a large number of those who were instrumental in the enactment of legislation of a like character. Its repeal will stop the ruinous contraction that is now prostrating all the valuable industries, establishing bankruptcy as the almost universal condition of the mercantile, agricultural, and other industrial classes, and will to some extent revive the confidence of the people and restore a hopeful condition of affairs.

In the State which I have the honor in part to represent, a large majority of all classes are in the most unmistakable manner indicating their displeasure with Congress for its failure to obey their behests in regard to it. Through its ruinous influence they daily witness a shrinkage in all values; their stock and their lands, their corn and their wheat, indeed everything that represents useful effort or power of production is melting into insignificance, while the manipulators of the national banks are swelling with arrogance and daily adding to the measure of their merciless extortions.

Let me warn the representatives of these national banks and the exempted bondholders in time, the people may not stand the extortions that their unholy greed engenders; and, while I recognize it as true that one wrong never justifies another, if they would correctly read the history of the past or comprehend the movements of mankind, they would understand that their injustice may drive the people to action that will bury their bonds and their banks and overswollen avarice and arrogance in a common ruin.

Second,

THE REPEAL OF THE NATIONAL-BANKING LAWS,

the withdrawal of their circulation, the substitution of the Treasury note therefor, and the consequent absorption and cancellation of nearly four hundred million dollars ($400,000,000) of the bonds of the Government, the interest coupons on which are semi-annually clipped from them and 6 per cent. in gold paid to these bankers out of the treasure of the people, thus saving nearly twenty million dollars ($20,000,000) annually that will thereafter be diffused among them to encourage enterprise and restore hope and public confidence.

It is objected by the hard-money advocates that this is "inflation of an irredeemable currency." Now, as inflation signifies increase or expansion it is difficult for an ordinary mind to conceive how the substitution of a certain number of current representative dollars issued by one authority in lieu of and to the destruction of an equal number issued by another can expand or increase the amount. And as to the irredeemability, the same objection (though a false one) can be urged to the national-bank issue, as the security for both is the pledged faith of the nation, the only difference being that the national-bank issue entails and perpetuates against the people an interest-bearing debt that every sixteen years equals the principal, while the Treasury note extinguishes the interest and at the same time destroys nearly four hundred millions dollars ($400,000,000) of values that by unwise legislation are now exempted from all public burdens. The bonds are now held at and above par in gold by all the money-dealers of the world. It is absurd to declare that the same faith and credit that attaches to the bond will not sustain the Treasury note used for internal trade when the odious discriminations against their value are repealed. A common mind can but arrive at the conclusion that the real object desired by the authors and supporters of the national-bank policy is to perpetuate for the benfit of the rich the bonded debt exempted from taxation, the avails and interest of which are wrung from and cripple every element useful to society.

RECEIVABLE FOR IMPORTS.

It will be very difficult to convince the people that the discriminations against the legal-tenders were not enacted to destroy them and perpetuate the exempted bonds and the national banks. Not receivable as interest on the public debt or for duties on imports, their field of usefulness is circumscribed and the unqualified indorsement of the credit of the Government is withdrawn from them. Let them be made receivable for duties on imports and their appreciation in value to a gold standard will readily follow and be permanent.

In conclusion, sir, it has been my attempt to show that all legislation of the kind referred to by me has a common origin that it all proceeds from a want of confidence in the ability of the people to govern, that it not only results to their detriment in private pursuits, but that the standard of official and private morals is degraded by its influence; that all such legislation is in hostility to the genius of our institutions and a correct conception of the object for which our Government was established, its fundamental theory being that the people have the capacity and the right to rule.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, obtained the floor, and yielded to Mr. RANDALL, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLOUNT having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at eight o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BANNING: Resolutions of the Legislature of Ohio, asking that Congress amend the pension laws so that wounded Union soldiers who failed to make application for pension within the time prescribed by law may now be permitted to make application therefor, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BURLEIGH: The petition of the Maine Editors and Publishers' Association, that they be relieved from prepaying the postage on newspapers sent from the office of publication to subscribers, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. CASWELL: The petition of Mrs. Joanna W. Turner, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FOSTER: The petition of Charles Leimbach, to change the name of his schooner from J. L. Quimby to Perry G. Walker, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HENDEE: The petition of Sarah E. Porter, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Curtis Elkins, that he be re-imbursed $175, money paid the collector of customs for the district of Vermont in 1872 and retained by said collector without authority of law, to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. LEAVENWORTH: Resolutions of the Legislature of New York, requesting the Senators and Representatives from that State to use their influence to secure, without delay, the legislation necessary for the protection of the immigrants, as well as for the security of the towns and cities of said State, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. LYNDE: The petition of Durands, Robinson & Co., and other manufacturers and dealers in tobacco, of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, against changing the law regulating the manner of packing tobacco, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. McMAHON: Memorial of numerous dealers in tobacco and cigars, of Dayton, Ohio, against any change in the mode of packing tobacco, to the same committee.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of Philip McManus, formerly of Company E, One hundred and sixth regiment, Pennsylvania Volunteers, for the removal of the charge of desertion, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. PHELPS: Memorial of James Caler, that he paid $18,858.77 additional compensation for dredging done in the bar at Rutherford Park, on the Passaic River, New Jersey, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. PIERCE: The petition of envelope-manufacturers, printers, stationers, and lithographers, of Massachusetts, against the gratuitous distribution by the Government of envelopes, newspaper wrappers, and postal cards, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. SWANN: The petition of Mrs. Jane Moore, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

By Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina: The petition of Rev. C. H. Powell, for reforms in the administration of the Government, and suggesting a plan whereby to prevent frauds and violations of duty by Government officials, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 4, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

TELEGRAPH OPERATOR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore announced the appointment of William A. Young telegraph operator for the Senate wing of the Capitol, vice William L. Ives, resigned.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 3360) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to pay the expenses of delegates from the eastern band of Cherokee Indians was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, for the information of the Committee on Commerce, a report of the board of engineers for the Pacific coast, respecting the encroachments of the sea upon the city of Fort Stevens, at the mouth of the Columbia River, in Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 11th instant, a report of the Quartermaster-General in relation to the Western and Atlantic Railroad; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I have been requested to present, and most willingly I do present, a great number of petitions representing the case of an American citizen immured in an English prison. Edward O'Meagher Condon is and has for eight years been undergoing a life-sentence in prison in England. His offense was political, at least in its occasion and in the circumstances out of which it grew. His fate has awakened sympathy throughout America, and has swollen into a current of sentiment of which the evidence in part is here. These petitions come from twenty-two States and at least two Territories. Legislators, lawyers, judges, and chief citizens have united in them, in the States of Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Illinois, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Missouri, Wisconsin, New Jersey, Michigan, Minnesota, Kansas, Colorado, Iowa, Indiana, Georgia, Nebraska, Texas, Tennessee, Kentucky, and in Idaho, Montana, and other Territories. Petitions have been signed asking the intervention of Congress in behalf of this captive. The Executive Government has been assiduous in endeavoring to obtain a mitigation of the sentence, and whether, in addition to the efforts it has made, anything be possible I know not. The House of Representatives has passed one, indeed I believe two, resolutions asking the Executive still further to interpose. Those resolutions are here before the Committee on Foreign Relations; and now come all of these petitions, representing such a volume of sentiment and being such an utterance of sympathy as has rarely come from the people of this country to either House of Congress.

I present them and move their reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations in the hope that some good may come from their presentation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented a memorial, signed by commercial and business men of New York City, remonstrating against the total repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SARGENT presented the memorial of A. Roman & Co. and others, printers, stationers, and lithographers, of California, remonstrating against the Government selling below cost envelopes, newspaper-wrappers, and postal cards, stating at length their objections to the system; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of manufacturers and dealers in tobacco, of Mansfield, Ohio, remonstrating against any change in the mode of packing tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petitions of Edward Welsh, Peter Welsh, and Elizabeth Mannion, of Mineral County, West Virginia, praying compensation for property destroyed by the Federal forces during the the late war; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WADLEIGH presented the memorial of Henry B. Brown, praying the passage of a bill authorizing the settlement of his claim for services while in charge of the affairs of the legation at Rome; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BURNSIDE presented the petition of R. C. Gratlin, of Arkansas, praying for the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of W. W. Corcoran and other property-holders in the District of Columbia, setting forth the advantages to accrue from the removal of rocks in the channel of the Potomac River above Georgetown, and praying that Congress take action in the matter; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of William H. French, brevet captain United States Army, late Indian agent for the Sioux Indians at Crow Creek, Dakota, praying the allowance of his claim on account of cattle purchased for the agency; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DORSEY presented a petition of settlers on the Hot Springs reservation, in the State of Arkansas, praying that Congress may provide for the sale of the lands of the reservation upon an equitable basis, reserving to bona fide settlers the right and privilege of purchasing their substantially improved premises at a nominal or reasonable price on deferred payments; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of citizens of Oregon, praying for the establishment of a post-route from Silver Lake to Prineville, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Butler County, Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of an act granting a pension to Hamilton Gillespie, late a private in Company H, Eighteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Oregon, praying for the passage of an act for the relief of Mrs. Minerva Shipley and Miss Nancy Spaulding, daughters of Daniel Spaulding who served in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SAULSBURY presented a memorial of the city council of Wilmington, Delaware, in favor of a survey of the Brandywine River by the Government with a view to a removal of rocks for the improvement of the navigation of the river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a resolution of the Legislature of New York, in favor of the re-appropriation of the sum of $500 appropriated by a resolution of the Continental Congress of 1777, and not paid over, as is alleged, for the erection of a monument over the grave of General Nicholas Herkimer; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that during the leave of absence which has been granted to the Speaker of the House, it had appointed Hon. SAMUEL S. COX, of the State of New York, Speaker pro tempore of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 3269) appropriating $50,000 for subsistence supplies for Apache Indians in Arizona Territory and for the removal of the Indians of the Chiricahua agency to the San Carlos agency; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

REPORT ON LABOR.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print extra copies of the report on labor in Europe and America, have instructed me to report back the same with an amendment and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed and bound of the special report on labor in Europe and America (Executive Document No. 41) 800 copies, 500 for the Senate, and 300 for the Department of State to supply legations and consulates in foreign countries.

REPORTS OF GEOGRAPHICAL SURVEYS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same committee have instructed me to report back a resolution of the House of Representatives in relation to the distribution of the reports of the United States geographical surveys west of the one hundredth meridian and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the following distribution shall be made of the reports of the United States geographical surveys west of the one hundreth meridan, published in accordance with acts approved June 23, 1874, and February 15, 1875, as the several volumes are issued from the Government Printing Office, to wit, 950 copies of each to the House of Representatives, 250 copies of each to the Senate, and 800 copies of each to the War Department for its use.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Laurence P. N. Laudrum, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 813) granting an increase of pension to Laurence P. N. Laudrum.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2302) granting a pension to Nancy Tipton, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 734) for the relief of William Jasper Cordill, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 369) to exempt all vessels engaged in the navigation of the Mississippi River and its tributaries above the port of New Orleans from entries and clearances, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1939) granting a pension to Sarah Emmons, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 197) granting a pension to Julia A. Schutt, widow of Martin Schutt, a deceased soldier, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 97) to return to the Treasury certain unexpended balances, to report it back and to move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution on the ground that the general law will cover balances into the Treasury at the end of the fiscal year.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WITHERS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1178) granting a pension to John Gropper, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Nathaniel W. Hays, of Bradley County, Tennessee, praying compensation for supplies alleged to have been furnished to United States troops during the late war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WADLEIGH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 814) for the relief of Henry B. Brown; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 815) to establish a zoological park near the Capitol, in the District of Columbia, and to incorporate a company to maintain the same and construct a street-railroad thereto; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. WHYTE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

L. MADISON DAY.

Mr. WRIGHT. Some days since there was a report made from the Committee on Claims upon the petition of L. Madison Day, praying the re-imbursement of money paid for property purchased by him from the Government. The report was concurred in, and a motion was entered to reconsider. I now ask that the order concurring in the report of the committee be reconsidered and that the claim be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to a reconsideration of the vote by which the report was concurred in? The petition will be recommitted to the Committee on Claims if there is no objection. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

C. G. FREUDENBERG.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Some days ago I gave notice of a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 189) placing the name of C. G. Freudenberg upon the retired list of the United States Army was indefinitely postponed. I now ask unanimous consent to take action upon the case for the purpose of having the bill recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to reconsidering the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed? The Chair hears none. The bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs if there is no objection.

LANDS OF SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the resolution submitted by me on the 9th of March last to inquire into the manner in which patents for lands have been issued to the Southern Pacific Railroad under the acts of July 27, 1866, and March 3, 1871, and whether the rights of settlers have not been disregarded, be taken from the Calendar and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED RECESS FOR CENTENNIAL CEREMONIES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to submit the following resolution and ask its present consideration:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the two Houses of Congress accept the invitation of the Centennial Commission to attend the ceremonies to be observed at the opening of the International Exhibition of 1876 on the 10th instant at Philadelphia; and to that end, when the respective Houses shall adjourn on Tuesday, the 9th instant, it shall be to meet at twelve o'clock on Friday, the 12th instant.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see the resolution provides for an adjournment from next Tuesday until Friday, a week from to-morrow, which leaves for the business of the Senate Monday and Friday and Saturday of next week.

Mr. INGALLS. And Tuesday also.

Mr. EDMUNDS. According to human experience, not Tuesday also.

Mr. SHERMAN. We had better make it Monday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the resolution by striking out "Tuesday" and inserting "Monday," and by striking out "Friday" and inserting the Monday following, with the proper day of the month. The effect of that would be to make this a complete adjournment of a week, from next Monday until the Monday afterward, because I believe that all our experience shows that when we adjourn three or four days in the middle of the week, and especially for a festive and national occasion like this, when it is supposed that every one of us with his best attire and headed by the presiding officer will take up the line of march for Philadelphia, these driblets at the two ends amount to nothing at all; and in this case I think they will only be an annoyance instead of an advantage either to us or to the public service. If we are to adjourn at all, which I do not object to under the circumstances, I think we might adjourn for the whole week with advantage to the public business rather than with injury to it; because whatever time may be saved (and I think with a good many of us individually who have a great deal of work to do much time may be saved instead of going to Philadelphia on this particular occasion, as much as we sympathize with it) can be devoted to the work of committees, and instead of being obliged to come into the Senate and see it adjourn and then go to something else that we shall have a clear week for the work of the Senate necessary to be done outside of this Chamber and that is now in the hands of the committees.

This is my reason for proposing the amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is one other practical suggestion which I wish to make in addition to what the Senator from Vermont has already said. I take it that Senators at some period of time during the exposition will be desirous of looking at it. If we fix the time of this adjournment according to the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, it will afford us all that opportunity. If we do not do that, I think we should be very sure to take some other period; and we may therefore unite the utility of the thing together with what the Senator from Vermont has suggested. I hope his amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to say one word. This resolution was drawn by me in the interest of economy of time. The Senator from Vermont suggests that practically it will not have that effect. I am by no means sure that it will, but it was drawn up not so much on my own judgment as after some conference with the gentlemen representing the House of Representatives as to their views upon the subject and with a desire to economize time. Now, practically we might, if we were disposed so to do, adjourn here on Tuesday afternoon after a day's legislation and reach Philadelphia that evening at a not very late hour, and we might return on Thursday night, or on Friday morning even, in season to have a legislative day on Friday, and so we should get four days out of the week. I do not know, as the Senator from Vermont suggests, that it is practicable to do any such thing, but I have already stated that the only object I had in introducing the resolution was to economize time by meeting on Friday, and thus saving two days. If the Senate think otherwise, very well. I do not expect to spend more than two days myself in Philadelphia.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, if the argument of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] be sound and the suggestion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] be a good one—and I do not rise to question either—I submit that the resolution as it will be amended will defeat the object in view. The purpose, as I understand the Senators, is to give all the time which is likely to be lost to legislation, and make it useful to those who are to go and those who have something to do here aside from the Senate; and the proposition is to adjourn from Monday next until the following Monday. The result of that I think will be that there will be no quorum here on Monday next; at all events there will be a very great unlikelihood of anything being done. The impeachment trial is to begin this morning, this being Thursday, and there are three remaining days this week. I think it will hardly be supposed that the impeachment trial or any other grave business will proceed on Monday if it is known in advance that when the Senate adjourns that day it is not to meet again until the Monday following. Therefore I suggest to the Senator from Vermont that if he wants, as he says, to have a clear week, he make his amendment to read that when we adjourn on Saturday of this week, or on the last day of this week when we shall sit, nobody is asked to remain over Sunday for the chance of being here during that part of the day on Monday, if there shall be any such part, when legislative or judicial or any other business will be done.

I think everybody must see that, Sunday preceding this day, even if we were to sit on Saturday, there is very little prospect that, a quorum of the Senate being able to go away on Saturday, those members of the Senate who want to go away will remain here over Saturday and Saturday night and Sunday for the opportunity of doing such business as is likely to be done in the one single day sandwiched between Sunday and the adjournment. I venture to predict that it will amount to nothing, and I suggest to the Senator from Vermont (and I have no objection to moving the amendment myself) that, if the resolution is to be changed so as to give a clear week, it had better be so changed that when we adjourn on the last day of this week nobody shall be called upon to be here again until the end of the period for which the adjournment takes place. The isthmus of time between is so narrow and the probability is so slight of its being of any use that I do not think that chance will compensate any one for the inconvenience of feeling compelled to be here or a contingency, and therefore I make the suggestion that it be changed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York proposes to amend the amendment. The Secretary will read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. So that the effect will be that when the two Houses adjourn at the end of this present week, on Saturday next, if we sit on Saturday—and I do not wish to anticipate that question, for I do not know what in the Senate may be the requirement of the trial which is to proceed—the two Houses adjourn until Monday the 15th, or whatever is the day named for re-assembling in the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair reminds the Senator from California before he commences that the time has expired. By common consent, the Senator may continue. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not propose to debate this matter at length; but I should like to remark that the tendency seems to be to extend this time, and perhaps it will very soon grow into a proposition to adjourn sine die. I shall vote for the shortest time. The proceedings at Philadelphia will occupy but one day; and it seems to me that it is hardly appropriate for us to adjourn for more than three days at the very outside. We have business of very considerable importance pressing on the attention of the Senate, and I trust that we shall not be too generous in giving away the time which we ought to occupy here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York, that when the Senate adjourns at the close of this week it adjourn to meet on Monday, the 15th.

The question being put, it was declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask for the yeas and nays, and venture again to state my proposition. The Chair states my amendment to be that when we adjourn at such a time, it be to meet on the 15th. That is not my amendment. I agree with the Senator from California and shall vote to adjourn for the shortest time adequate to enable us all to pay the respect and manifest the sympathy which we all feel for the great occasion which marks this adjournment. Therefore my amendment I say again is not that, but it is, that if we are to adjourn for what the Senator from Vermont calls a week, in place of being compelled to remain here over Sunday in order to take such part as may be taken in the legislative or other proceedings on Monday, and Monday only, and to adjourn the next day for a week, the adjournment shall begin on the day when we leave off business this week; so that I move to strike out Tuesday, if that be the day assigned by the Senator from Vermont——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Monday.

Mr. CONKLING. I move to strike out "Monday" and insert the preceding Saturday. That will leave all Senators free to say whether they want to adjourn for a week or not, my whole point being that if we are to adjourn for a week, in place of coming here on Monday to adjourn on Monday, we be discharged on Saturday from the necessity of coming back for a part of that one single day when I think every Senator will agree with me in the light of past experience, we shall accomplish absolutely nothing, and when the result will be that such members of the Senate as feel at liberty to absent themselves will have gone on Saturday and such as feel constrained by conscientious or any other reasons to be here will come on Monday to engage in a futile attempt to proceed with the public business and then to adjourn, having thereby lost for their individual purposes, whatever their convenience may be, a day or two in consequence.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, on reflection I am rather inclined to think the amendment of the Senator from New York had better not be adopted. I should agree with him as to the practical effect of the thing were it not for the circumstance that we are engaged in hearing argument, or shall be presently, upon a very interesting question. It is possible that the learned gentlemen on both sides will not have an opportunity this week to conclude what they desire to say, and in that case we should have Monday, if we are not to adjourn until Monday, to conclude the argument; and of course everybody can see that it is much better that all that is to be said upon the question should be said consecutively and as a part of one steady consideration. Therefore I am inclined to think that Senators will feel it to be a duty, if we do not adjourn until Monday and should not have finished the consideration of this matter by that time, to attend on Monday, and not to go away until the Senate should have adjourned. Then they will have a practical week.

Mr. CONKLING. I now withdraw the call for the yeas and nays and ask for a division on my motion which is to strike out "Monday" and insert "Saturday."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment suggested by the Senator from New York.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And to that end, when the respective Houses shall adjourn on Saturday the 6th instant, it shall be to meet at twelve o'clock on Monday the 15th instant.

Mr. CONKLING. My amendment is nothing in reference to Monday the 15th instant, which I shall vote against myself; but it is simply to substitute Saturday of this week for Monday next. I want to take the sense of the Senate on that question alone, disconnected with the length of time for which we are to adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Clerk states truly the effect of the Senator's amendment. If his amendment prevails and then the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, and then if the resolution as amended passes, the effect of it will be, as the Clerk states, to adjourn from Saturday to the 15th.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly; and if we are to adjourn to the 15th, I wish the adjournment to commence on Saturday.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I wish the Senate to understand the difference between the resolution itself as originally proposed and as it will be if amended by the motion of the Senator from New York. The resolution contemplates an adjournment of the two Houses on the evening of Tuesday and the re-assembling on Friday.

Mr. CONKLING. In other words, Mr. President, if I may be allowed, the difference is this: In either case we adjourn until Monday the 15th; in the one case that adjournment begins on Saturday and in the other case it does not begin until Monday.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My friend certainly misapprehends. As the resolution is it will be an adjournment from Tuesday to Friday of next week.

Mr. CONKLING. I am going to vote with my friend from Maine on that; but the Senator from Vermont has moved an amendment which will carry the adjournment over until Monday week. My point is that if that adjournment is to take place, it shall begin on Saturday, not on the Monday following that Saturday; in other words that we shall not be compelled to stay here over Sunday in order to be here on one single day of next week.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am very apprehensive that my honorable friend is not working much on my side in that way.

Mr. PADDOCK. I suggest that this question can be decided more intelligently to-morrow; so, if it is in order, I move the postponement of its further consideration until to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. Call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska interposes an objection.

Mr. PADDOCK. Yes, sir.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of twelve o'clock and thirty minutes having arrived, legislative and executive business will be suspended and the Senate will now, according to order, proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap having adjourned, then resumed its LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes its legislative session.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope the Senator will give way for a motion that we go into executive session for a few minutes.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to withdraw a motion to reconsider an order for printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and forty-six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 4, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

HAWAIIAN TREATY.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I ask the House by unanimous consent to make the future consideration and determination of the bill to carry into effect the treaty with the Hawaiian Islands the special order for Monday next after the reading of the Journal. If that order is made I believe that by two o'clock at the very furthest the whole matter will be disposed of.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that the gentleman change his proposition so that the bill shall be made the special order after the call of States and Territories.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Very well. Let it be after the morning hour; and to the exclusion of all other orders.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not object to the proposition, but I do not think that the matter can be disposed of so soon as my colleague on the committee appears to think. I understand there are to be three speeches.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Two and a half.

Mr. KELLEY. I am afraid the half one may turn out to be a full speech.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. We will not trespass on the patience of the House longer than is possible.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from New York? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

MACHINERY FOR PREPARATION OF RAW SILK.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the House to take up for consideration at this time a bill which is recommended unanimously by the Committee of Ways and Means, the bill (H. R. No. 3270) for the admission of machinery for the preparation of raw silk free of duty.

Mr. MILLS. I object.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman will hear me for a moment I think he will withdraw his objection. I hope the House will consent to my making a statement not to occupy more than two or three minutes.

Mr. MILLS. I withdraw for the present my objection, reserving the right to renew it, in order to hear the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KELLEY. Almost the entire territory of the United States is capable of producing raw silk. So early as the days of Queen Caroline the ladies of Georgia sent her silk of their manufacture from the native trees of Georgia for one of her royal robes.

The culture of silk has, however, never succeeded in this country, and for two reasons; one was, that it was produced and prepared by women and children in countries where the labor of skilled men commanded but nominal wages; the other was, that there was no market for it in this country, as silk goods were not manufactured here, and there was consequently no market for the raw material. The application of ingenious machinery now in use in France for reeling silk from the cocoon it is hoped will enable us to enter largely on the business, as we now manufacture over 40 per cent. of the silk goods consumed in the country.

The bill is not a novelty. We have given the right to import beet-root seed free, in order to introduce the culture of beets for sugar. We have given the right to introduce free of duty the machinery necessary to make beet-root sugar, in order that our mechanics might have models for imitation. We have given the sugar and cotton planters of the South the right to import steam-plows free of duty. This bill is in fact in pursuance of a long line of precedents. It is hoped that by the introduction of a few sets of this machinery our ingenious workmen will imitate it, and that the women and children of the South and West and of California may find light and lucrative employment in supplying the country with raw silk and silk-worm eggs.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] will probably be surprised to learn that there are carried across this continent annually $20.000,- 000 worth of those tiny things, silk-worm eggs. Disease has attacked the silk-worms of France, of Italy, and the Low Countries, and they depend each year for a fresh crop of worms on the eggs of China and Japan; and the records of the Union and Central Pacific Railroads show that $20,000,000 worth of these tiny products of the insect cross our country annually. If we can establish the reeling of raw silk, we may furnish this product from the fields of Arkansas—for that State is one wide silk-field; there is no part of it to which the mulberry is not indigenous—from Georgia, South Carolina, the whole of the South, from Texas, from Alabama, from California, and other States.

Mr. RANDALL. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KELLEY. In a moment. Coming now to the point, the object of this bill is to give our workmen the chance of following the models of the ingenious machinery used in the preparation of raw silk.

Mr. RANDALL. That is what I wanted to know; whether we could not now manufacture in this country this machinery?

Mr. KELLEY. We cannot. This bill limits the introduction of the machinery free of duty to a period of two years.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to ask the gentleman if the duties to be realized on this machinery have not got to be put on some other imports by the people of the United States?

Mr. KELLEY. If the duties are maintained the machinery will probably not be imported. The probabilities are that if the bill be passed one or two sets will be imported as models, and then the article can and will be manufactured among us.

I will only add that one French silk manufacturer two years ago came to Kansas and purchased thirty-six hundred acres of land, set out mulberry trees, and started a silk-factory. Last year he produced by the hands of the women and children of a French colony sixteen hundred pounds of cocoons. He has eggs and mulberry trees to produce ten thousand pounds this year. He will, if the duties be remitted, at once introduce one set of this machinery and put it in operation in the centennial building, where the mechanics of the several States may study it and thus domesticate among us that most profitable and beautiful industry, the culture of silk.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The object is to organize and establish a new industry?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes; a new industry.

Mr. LAWRENCE. A very desirable thing.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope the gentleman from Texas will withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill at this time?

Mr. MILLS. I will withdraw my objection to the consideration of the bill, but will make my objection to the bill when it comes up by voting against it.

Mr. CHAPIN. I object to the consideration of the bill.

POINT LOOKOUT.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be, and are, instructed to inquire into the matter of the payment of moneys by the War Department on the property known as Point Lookout, in Saint Mary's County, Maryland, in furtherance of an act of Congress approved March 21, 1866, making it one of the sites of the National Military Asylum, and report what steps, if any, are necessary to preserve said property for such purpose.

I submit for the consideration of the House the law in relation to this matter:

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That all the property of the United States now at Point Lookout, Saint Mary's County, Maryland, shall be and become the property of the asylum so soon as a title to the satisfaction of the board of managers shall be made to the asylum of at least three hundred acres of land, including that on which said property of the United States is now built and maintained or held.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That Congress may at any time hereafter alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Approved March 21, 1866.

I also submit the proceedings of the board of managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers:

Mr. Gunckel, from the select committee appointed to further consider the proposition of Miss Baker as to the Point Lookout property, reported the facts, and asked the board to hear Miss Baker as to certain modifications to her original proposition, which was agreed to and Miss Baker again heard upon the subject.

After further consideration the following action was had:

The b ard having heard the report of the committee on the proposition of Miss D. P. Baker to donate to the National Home the Point Lookout property, it was Resolved, That the board will accept said property whenever presented to us, with a clear title for the use of the Home. If the donor shall offer it with any restrictions the board will refer the offer to Congress, for power to accept it with those restrictions, if Congress shall so direct.

No objection being made, the resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DUNNELL. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order of business is the calling of committees for reports, and the morning hour begins at twenty-five minutes after twelve. The call rests with the Committee on Public Lands, the pending bill being the bill (S. No. 2) to repeal section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, making restrictions in the disposition of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that the Committee on Public Lands will consent to postpone the measure now before the House until to-morrow, so that to-day may be devoted to the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. SAYLER. To-morrow is Friday and private-bill day, and I do not suppose that the Committee on Public Lands could have an opportunity to report to-morrow under the rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On to-morrow the committees can only report private bills.

Mr. SAYLER. I would say that the bill pending is under the management of my colleague on the committee from Louisiana, [Mr. MOREY,] and whether he cares to press the bill this morning or not I do not know; he has charge of it.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman from Louisiana will yield until Saturday I think there will be no objection to taking up his bill.

Mr. MOREY. On Saturday?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes.

Mr. MOREY. Very well; I have no disposition to press the bill before that time in antagonism to the Committee on Appropriations, on the condition that I shall have the morning hour on Saturday.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the post-office appriation bill; but before that motion is put I wish to ask the House to limit general debate on that bill to some reasonable hour. Many gentlemen are thinking of an adjournment for the centennial opening, and I think it is quite obvious that this bill ought to pass before any such adjournment. I think there ought to be some limit to the general debate, and I would suggest that all general debate on the bill close at half past three o'clock to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that he extend the time half an hour, or there will be hardly time enough.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will agree to the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, and move that all general debate close at four o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me for a moment to make a report or two?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield for that purpose.

HEIRS OF BRIGADIER-GENERAL THOMPSON.

Mr. DAVIS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1638) for the relief of the heirs of Brigadier-General Thompson, of the Revolutionary Army; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES BARNETT.

Mr. DAVIS also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 462) granting additional pay to the heirs of James Barnett, a captain in the revolutionary war; and moved that the bill be laid on the table, and that the report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF RICHARD HALE.

Mr. DAVIS also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3366) for the relief of the legal representatives of Richard Hale, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM GEMMILL.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3114) for the relief of William Gemmill; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ALFRED ROWLAND.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3367) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Alfred Rowland; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 110) authorizing the exhibition of a life-saving station at the centennial exposition.

The message further announced that the Senate was ready to proceed upon the impeachment of William W. Belknap, and to receive the managers on the part of the House, and that the Senate Chamber was prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DUNNELL. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the post-office appropriation bill.

The motion of Mr. HOLMAN was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House, all general debate upon the pending bill will close at four o'clock this day. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, during the time that I shall occupy the attention of the Committee of the Whole, I desire to address myself to the consideration of what I conceive to be the want of contentment and fraternity in the country. Owing to certain existing laws remaining on our statute-books, it seems to me there is a reason for some discontent in the minds of many of the people of the South; and I am painfully impressed with the fact that many of our northern brethren do not exhibit toward the people of the South that spirit of fraternity and love which is so much desired by that portion of the country. My object upon this occasion is to attempt to do good. I desire to see happiness and joy brought to every household in this broad land of ours. I desire to see satisfaction and contentment brought to the mind of every citizen of whatever race, color, or condition, throughout the length and breadth of our land.

There is remaining on the statute-books of the country the joint resolution of March 2, 1867, which forbids any officer of the Government paying a debt to any person who sympathized with the rebellion. That reaches even persons who were not in the confederate army; men who simply held the office of magistrate or of constable, or any other office which required the taking of an oath to support the confederate government.

On Monday last I attempted to introduce a resolution which looked to the payment of the debts due to mail-contractors and postmasters in the Southern States on the 31st of May, 1861. I desire now to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to that subject, the mention of which on Monday last caused the House so suddenly to adjourn. The reason why that debt has not yet been paid is because the joint resolution to which I have referred is still in force.

Early in this session I introduced a bill for the repeal of that joint resolution, because I thought the time had come for its repeal; I thought the spirit of harmony and love was so abroad in this land of ours that the time for its repeal had surely come. Some of my friends suggested to me to let it go the Committee on the Judiciary. It did go there, and is there yet; it has not come before the House.

Now let us for a moment examine the reasons why this debt should be paid, for it is nothing but a debt, due to mail-contractors and postmasters, down to May 31, 1861. First, it is a debt which has been audited and is recognized by the Department as due. I have the letter of the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury, the Auditor for the Post-Office Department, in which he states the amount now audited upon his books as about $369,000 due mail-contractors and about $50,000 due postmasters.

I think it is the duty of the Government to meet its debts and to develop the country. Every dollar withheld from the downtrodden people of the South in their poverty is that much money withheld from the development of the country. I might make mention of many things that the country is interested in which are produced in my own State and in my own district, the eighth congressional district of North Carolina. I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to be read, an article which I have marked in the Cincinnati Enquirer of April 28, 1876.

The Clerk read as follows:

AS TO NORTH CAROLINA'S CLAIMS.

There has been for many years an impression that North Carolina produced nothing in the world except tar, turpentine, pitch, resin, and Bill Allen. Whether it was believed that these five staples of existence were enough to entitle the Old North State to honorable distinction in the sisterhood, or that others she had not, we will not pretend to argue at this time. Enough it is to know that all five of them have been in times past, are now, and promise to be in the future important integrals in the commerce and affairs of our nation. The tar, turpentine pitch, and resin are certainly entitled to the rank of indispensables, in the order named, to our agriculture, our manufactures, our ship-building, and our commerce generally, while Bill Allen has in times past and in times recent shown himself so invaluable to all classes and conditions of American people that we are inclined to dispute North Carolina's proprietorship in him, and claim him for the nation at large. We all claim him now.

But these are not all the titles on which the Old North State bases her claims to distinction. She is a large producer of other valuable staples in the commerce of the world. With an area of over fifty thousand square miles, which is greater than the State of New York, and almost equal to the whole of England, she will compare favorably with any of her sister States in productiveness of soil, salubrity of climate, and variety of products. She has a coast range of more than two hundred miles, with two of the finest harbors on the western continent; she has seven navigable rivers emptying into the Atlantic, and numerous smaller ones which furnish water-power equal to the famed "powers" of the New England States. She has eleven hundred miles of railroad completed and in active operation, with almost an equal amount projected and in course of construction. In the way of agricultural products she can point with pride to her broad acreage of wheat, oats, rye, barley, and tobacco and cotton; in horticulture, to her apples, peaches, pears, and grapes; in sweet-potatoes she heads all the rest of the States. In the way of minerals, she produces gold, silver, copper, lead, zinc, and iron. The first gold mines in the United States were discovered in North Carolina in 1820, and they were worked with great profit until 1847—with so great profit, indeed, that the Government established a branch mint at Raleigh, which was run until a few years ago. Up to that time twenty-nine counties in the State produced gold in sufficient quantities to be profitable to the miner. Until the discovery of the California mines, in 1849, all the gold dug in the United States came from North Carolina and Georgia. But ranking in importance all her other mineral deposits is the iron of North Carolina. In thirty counties of the State iron is found in workable quantities, and in most of these the deposit is of remarkable purity. The red hemitite ore, so famed in Missouri, is abundant here, as are also the limonite and the magnetite, the former two being entirely free from sulphur, and therefore very easily worked. Twelve counties produce copper, and before the war the copper mines of North Carolina were among the most profitable of the kind in the United States. Besides these there are large deposits of graphite. Manganese and mica have been discovered, all of them in paying quantities, and only requiring scientific development to make them exceedingly profitable.

But we have said enough. When a State can produce all these things we have enumerated, and Bill Allen besides, it has no occasion to feel ashamed of its place in the sisterhood of Commonwealths or to be backward in the matter of asserting its claims to a proper recognition. North Carolina will please step forward and take a front seat in the audience. We invite her there.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. In addition to the statement just read by the Clerk in regard to the resources of the South, I desire to mention a very interesting fact connected with the iron-ores to be found in Western North Carolina. I believe that the iron ores of Western North Carolina, East Tennessee, and Northern Georgia are superior to any others to be found in the world. The other day General Wilder, late of the Army, was upon the floor of this House; he had in his hand a knife, manufactured in England, that was only three removes from the crude ore of Mitchell County, North Carolina. With that knife he was paring a tenpenny nail, and with no apparent damage to the blade of the knife.

I hope that no gentleman will withhold by his vote money which will develop the resources of the Southern States. It seems to me that sympathy with one's own State in time of trouble is not a valid reason why a debt should not be paid.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is the way that matter strikes me: Here are two men, A and B—A owes B a debt; they fall out and fight; A whips B. Is that a good reason why A should not pay B the debt? I think he ought to pay it so much the sooner to show that he is "a man for a' that and for a' that," and has the spirit of a man. That is the way I look at it.

Now, there is another view of this matter. It strikes me that to withhold the payment of these claims is unwise statesmanship. And bear in mind that I have a republican precedent in this book for the payment of a similar claim. In the Forty-second Congress the assistant United States marshals were paid the debt due them for taking the census. Here is the book; here is the law. That was done by a republican Congress. There was no difficulty raised about that; why should there be any trouble in regard to this question?

Bear in mind another thing. There are $50 000 due the postmasters, now audited. Let me tell you what has been done by the Treasury Department. If the amounts due from postmasters South to the Government had been paid to these disloyal contractors, as they are supposed to be, it would have looked something like fairness; but that has not been done. In every instance where the money could be collected the postmasters down there who owed the Government have been made to pay and the amount covered back into the Treasury. Was that fair sailing? These are things that address themselves to the good sense and the justice of every man.

I say it is bad policy and it is unwise statesmanship not to pay these claims. Let me tell you how we fell down in North Carolina. The incoming of the centennial year in North Carolina was saluted with the firing of cannon. That is the spirit with which the people there hailed the centennial year; that is the spirit that animates the South to-day. What stirred the people of North Carolina? It was her thousand sacred revolutionary memories. Within her borders lies the first battle-field of the revolution—Mooro's Creek—and at the old town of Charlotte, North Carolina, was the first declaration of American independence. Upon the border between North Carolina and South Carolina was the next to the last battle-field of the Revolution, King's Mountain. The memory of these things caused the hearts of the people down there to beat with a just pride in the part our ancestors had taken in the glorious struggle a hundred years ago.

I thank God for the centennial year of American Independence. I feel that I have just as much interest in the glory of my country as any man, I do not care where he comes from. I tell you that is the spirit which animates the people of the South to-day. What were they led to believe? They were led to believe that during the centennial year there would be a full restoration of peace and harmony and fraternity throughout our whole country. How has this expectation been realized? Almost the first thing we met when we came to the present Congress was the opposition of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] to universal amnesty, and his disposition to uncover the sad story of the war. Another gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] said the object of the cutting down salaries, &c., was to pay the claims of the South; that every man of the South who had lost a mule was coming forward and asking for pay. I find in another speech the following words:

For seventy years the spirit of hypocrisy and misrepresentation dominated over the slave-holding section of this confederacy. They continually presented themselves to the country and to the world as the friends of the Union, and it was a lie from first to last.

* * * * * * *

I am forced to confess to myself and with reluctance to say here that I do not in my heart believe that any man educated under and obedient to the influence of slavery can be the friend of a Union that is designed to establish and preserve equality.

* * * * * * *

The people of this country are already awake to the truth that the spirit of the rebellion which they supposed had been subdued by war is still powerful in the South; that it oppresses four millions of human beings; that it instigates all sorts of outrage and wrong; that there is no freedom in these old States for the people who are not identified with the old slaveholding aristocracy of that section of the country.

I commend to these gentlemen for their special reading the thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians.

Now I do not propose to defend slavery; I have nothing to do with that. I merely wish to say—and I know what I say when I speak it—that the people of the South rejoice in the freedom of the colored man. Let no man say that is not so. I have not found a man in the South who would have the colored man back in slavery; not one. On the contrary, the spirit is one of acquiescence; and I say to you to-day, instead of being the oppressors of 4,000,000 of people, the best, the truest friends of the colored people on the face of God's green earth are those with whom they were associated in the days of slavery. And let me say that slavery was not all gloomy, not all melancholy, because sometimes the most pleasant relations existed between the master and the servant. I have myself seen a long line of colored people marching in procession bearing one of their comrades to the grave, and next to the coffin were the master and mistress, going to pay respect to the memory of one who had served them faithfully in life—going to lay him away in his last resting-place.

Sir, it is a mistaken idea that the people of the South oppress the colored people. Why, sir, I will tell you what I have seen there myself. I have seen colored men going up in solid column and voting the republican ticket, and the next day one of them would go to his old master and ask for $5 to buy something to plow with; and he always got it.

We thank God for the freedom of the colored man. Let me tell you what is your duty. It is not alone to give the colored man the right to vote and hold property, but it is also your duty to educate him. You ought to appropriate a portion of the great national domain to educate the colored man, to give him a mind trained by education so he can take an intelligent part in the affairs of the Government.

Why do gentlemen always bring up the horrid things of the war? Why do they always talk about slavery? Doubtless all things, Mr. Chairman, are ordered by a spirit wiser, greater, and nobler than man can conceive of. I am one of those who believe all good things are brought about through the agency of divine Providence. Why do gentlemen object to slavery, when the colored man was doubtless brought to this country by a wise Providence in order that he might be educated, that he might be free, that he might become a man? What is he in his own country? He is in a degraded state. These are wards of the nation, and it is your duty to educate them. I am ready to help you; I am ready to cast my vote any time to educate the colored people and bring them up in the right way.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman from North Carolina let me ask him a question?

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I believe I would rather have you wait until I get through.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to ask the gentleman a question in regard to these colored men who do the voting down there, and who next day go to their employers and are refused the money to buy victuals with. Does not the gentleman know that colored men have been turned out of employment for not voting the way their employers wished them to vote?

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. Not in my section.

Mr. WHITE. I know such has been the case in my section.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. You may know it in your country, Mr. WHITE, but my people do not turn them off in that way. I will tell you what I have seen. I have seen colored people follow with guns, and rocks, and sticks a man, one of their own color, threatening him with death because he did not vote as they were taught to vote. I have seen that; and I am sorry for it.

Let me say in regard to the people of the South that we will possess our souls in patience in regard to all these things. Gentlemen say we must wait for the little amount due us down there. How long do you want us to wait? Is not fifteen years a good while? I am willing to wait if I cannot help myself; but do not ask me to wait until the next big centennial—do not ask that, as that is a little too far off.

I tell you, Mr. Chairman, the people down there intend to pay their taxes, and they do pay their taxes. They intend to support the Constitution of the United States and obey the laws. They intend to be good citizens, loyal and faithful, and they are so to-day. I could take you through my own mountain region, and when the shades of night have gathered about many an humble home the old Bible is brought out, a chapter is read, and prayer is made to God for the whole country and for the preservation of liberty upon this continent. That is the way our people feel. If you do not choose to recognize us now as to the justice of the debts due us, we will wait; we will be patient, we will be trustful, we will be obedient to the laws, we will be good citizens.

I confess, however, that I do not expect a great deal from men who bring up all the horrors of the late civil war in order to accomplish party ends. I do not expect much from that class of men, because I know that it is the meat upon which this our Cæsar has fed that he hath grown so great.

A gentleman has just asked me what is the amount of the Post-Office claim. I stated a while ago $369,000 was the amount due to the mail-contractors. That debt has been audited and is on your books. It is a claim similar to the one paid to the marshals for the service in 1860. Fifty thousand dollars is due to postmasters. Having answered that question, I will now go on.

I say that we do not hope for much from ambitious politicians. I hold in my hand a paper printed in Connecticut that is perfectly horrified at the idea of paying mail-contractors to the 31st of May, 1861. It talks about this "ex-confederate Congress." I would not hurt him if he were here. Perhaps the fight has all been taken out of me, but even if it had not, I would not hurt him even if he were here. Who, then, do I look to? I look to the people, and I believe this day if the question were put to the people, magnanimous and noble as they have proved to be upon a thousand occasions—I say if the question were put to the great American people whether this little sum of $400,000 should be paid, (a just debt due by the Government,) they would say to the Government, "Go pay it, and let us be done with it."

Who stands in the way? Somebody, of course. I say there is, as I believe, a spirit coming about which is all right, and I thank God for it. I wish all the people could get together and shake hands. I would like to see gathered together the people of Michigan and California and Connecticut and Massachusetts, &c., with the South. My heart grows warm at the mention of the name of Massachusetts, when I remember the eloquent speeches made by her Representatives upon this floor in reference to the celebration of the battle of Bunker Hill.

There is another class to whom we would ally ourselves; it is the soldiers of the North. Let me read to you from a North Carolina paper just received this morning what is said there. I hope gentlemen will listen to it:

The third national annual reunion of northern and southern soldiers will take place at Caldwell, Ohio, on the 5th of September next, lasting three days.

What an item that is to cheer the heart! The piece is headed "The blue and the gray." And what a notice that is to stir the human bosom! To see those who stood face to face when cannon swept the field with fire; to see them coming together once more—and I thank God for it—in fraternity and concord is a sight never to be forgotten.

The editor goes on to remark:

This is certainly a matter for sincere congratulation, and gives hopeful augury for the future welfare and glory of the country. It matters not where or when the former soldiers of the two sections are thrown together, there will be found the kindest intercourse and growing intimacies existing between them. General BANNING, of Ohio, whose gallantry on the field is only equaled by his wisdom and moderation in the council chamber, General RICE, from the same State, whose services in behalf of his country, the evidence of which he will bear to the grave, are not greater than the modesty with which he wears his honors, and General Williams, of Michigan, whose love of country in the past did not content itself with "windy supinations," and therefore does not now regard it necessary in order to give it "local habitation and a name," to wave the "bloody shirt," find pleasant companionship and welcome assistance from friendly association and legislative consultation with those men in Congress whom they opposed on the battle-field.

Among the most pleasing incidents witnessed during a recent visit to Washington was the friendly intercourse between two members of the House and their families. One of these gentlemen, a Representative from Ohio, had lost a leg in the Federal service, the other, a Representative from Mississippi, had lost an arm in the confederate service.

Yes, sir, we look to the soldiers of the North for fraternity and friendship. And why should there not be fraternity and friendship? The glory of the armies of the North and South is common. Their heritage is common. I cannot separate the fame of the blue and the gray. I cannot separate in my affections the dead soldiers who have fallen and sleep side by side upon the bloody field. In my affections these men have become united. I cannot deprive the one or the other of their glory, because they were my countrymen and they were my brethren, and they both fought for what they judged to be right. The men in gray fought for liberty, as they thought, and they had the idea that they could best enjoy it under the form of government for which they fought. The others fought for liberty, as they thought, and their idea was that they must all stay together. They both fought for liberty, and they both died nobly; and the time is coming when the people will speak of both sides as our soldiers.

The silent pillar, lone and gray,
Claims kindred with their sacred clay;
Their memory sparkles o'er the fountain,
Their spirits wrap the dusky mountain;
The meanest rill, the mightiest river,
Rolls, mingling with their fame, forever.

No, sir; I have no idea of separating the fame of the gray and the fame of the blue. They met in the stern and dreadful array of battle. They grappled as strong and brave men, and many of them died with their fingers stiffened around the flag-staff. And God forbid that I should stand up in this House or any part of this broad land and take away one iota from their just and glorious fame. Here they sleep well after life's fitful fever is over.

Now let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, that this is the very same spirit that animates the people of the South, and it is the spirit in which we are training up our children. I will relate to you a little circumstance which I had from a gentleman. He was traveling in the South during the month of May, a stranger, and he stopped near a burial ground, and through the trees he could see glimpses of a number of children all clothed in white; little girls they were, and each had a basket upon her arm filled with flowers, and there slept the gray on the one side and here slept the blue on the other, and the children were singing:

Under the sod and under the clay,
Here sleep the blue and there sleep the gray.
Light be our steps, as falleth the dew,
Tears for the gray and tears for the blue.
Come, sisters, come, let's scatter anew
Wreaths for the gray and wreaths for the blue.
Soft be our hearts through all the sweet day,
Smiles for the blue and smiles for the gray.

That is the spirit that animates the children down there, and the time is coming when we will know, as I trust, no difference.

Why, sir, the 10th of May will soon be here; the grand centennial gathering of the people (where many other countries will also be represented) will soon be at Philadelphia. Thank God for that spirit which is gathering the people together.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask permission of the gentleman from North Carolina to interrupt him for a moment just here for the purpose of saying that while I have not considered the bill to which he is speaking, I want to remark in advance of its consideration that the feeling between the North and the South to which he refers will not control my vote on it or kindred questions, and in response to the generous sentiments he has just uttered to say here and now substantially what I have said before to my own people and what I had the pleasure of saying to the people of Georgia during the annual State agricultural exhibition last fall. I happened to be, on last Decoration Day, in one of the towns of South Carolina, when I saw a lady decorating as I had never seen a grave decorated, framing it in sprays of arbor vitæ and lettering it beautifully, "as the grave of somebody's loved one." On returning to my hotel I inquired who the soldier was, and learned from a northern gentleman, who has passed many winters there, that it was a straggling Union soldier who had died of his wounds in that town—Aiken, South Carolina. He also told me that the lady whom I had seen decorating that grave with such care was, to use his phraseology, a rebel's wife, who prayed that somebody might decorate her son's unknown grave.

From Augusta, Georgia, my son and his companions, eight in number, returned in the evening; they had gone thither in the morning in roystering spirits, as is the wont of youth, to see the festivities of the day, a procession and the unveiling of a monument to confederate soldiers, and they came back to tell with emotion of the tenderness with which they had seen the ladies of that city decorating the graves of the boys who had worn the blue. I would heal the wounds of the war; and want to say to the gentleman from North Carolina and others from the South that they must not judge the spirit of us of the North by votes we may give on particular bills or special clauses.

And, in conclusion, I now say to him as I have said to my own people and to those of Georgia, and through him to the people of the entire South, treasure every tattered flag under which you fought; treasure every broken flag-staff as sacred relics; but attach to each, if you can, its whole story; let it tell all who may behold it how many hopeful youths, how many stalwart men marched forth under it; let it tell where they died, where they were maimed, what widows and orphans were made by the gallantry with which that tattered flag or broken staff was borne. I say to those who wore the gray and to those who wore the blue preserve every memento of your valor and your sacrifices, for the day will come when all the people will treasure every memento of American courage and sacrifice made in that great war. [Applause.] The day will come when those trophies, blending together as the dyes of yonder flag blend, will be cherished as among the richest heritages of a united and unbroken American people, and will warn our countrymen through all time of the terrible cost that would attend an attempt from any quarter to dismember the American Union. [Apulause.]

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I thank the gentleman for his generous words; I expected only such from him. Sir, I know his generous nature, and I had reason to believe that his heart was in the right place.

I was going on to remark that the grand centennial gathering of the people would be in a few days at Philadelphia, and there I hope that those who have so long been estranged will meet together and shake hands near the old Independence Hall. The South will be there, although we are poor and do not have as much to exhibit as some other parts of the world; yet, sir, we will be there with our specimens of cotton, rice, tobacco, iron, mica, agalmatolite, marble, copper, &c., with fruits from North Carolina, (including apples weighing twenty-four ounces,) and oranges from Florida. We will do what we can by way of exhibiting our products, but we will be there with something still better—our warm hearts and our warmer prayers for the restoration of unity and fraternity. Science has discovered to us a beautiful and wonderful truth. There is a stream that rises in the tropics and wends its way into the waters of the Atlantic Ocean northward. That stream can always be known by the water being warmer than it is in the sea around it, and the inquiry has often been made what is the object of that wonderful Gulf Stream? To my mind, sir, it has two objects; one is to warm up the colder regions of the north, and I have thought that the all-wise Being had another object in it. An iceberg breaks loose sometimes up at the north and comes thundering down into the bosom of the deep, and would soon destroy the shipping; but, sir, the warm fingers of the Gulf Stream get around this iceberg and imperceptibly the tremendous thing is melted away and carried to heaven in spray and mist.

Following out the idea of the Gulf Stream, we will come up from the South with our warm hearts, and if some immense iceberg from the State of Maine, or somewhere else, rushes down upon us to destroy us, we will come about it with our warm fingers and hope to melt it down into a man whose philanthropy shall be as broad as our country, and whose charity shall be as gentle as the dew upon the rose.

Mr. WHITE. Before the gentleman sits down, I wish he would let me have read an article from a newspaper in the State which he in part represents, which shows what good feeling exists on the part of some southern editors, as well as members. Some idea of the fraternal feeling which is fostered on this kind of food can better be imagined from the tone of this article than we have learned from the gentleman's speech.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I cannot do so, as I have promised to yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ANDERSON.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky can have what he wishes to have read printed in the RECORD, if there is no objection.

No objection was made.

The article referred to by Mr. WHITE is as follows:

AMMUNITION FOR CONNECTICUT—A SOUTHERN DEMOCRATIC VIEW OF THE RESULT IN NEW HAMPSHIRE.

[From the Charlotte (North Carolina) Observer.]

Returns from New Hampshire indicate that the republicans elected their ticket in the State on Tuesday by something more than a thousand votes. We are not at all surprised at the result; in fact, we expected it. We cannot trust any State whose interests are confined to manufactories. The great mass of voters are merely political automatons; are under the surveillance of their employers; have no freedom of opinion; are dependent upon others for their daily bread; and like dumb cattle, are driven to the shambles at their masters' will. Besides, there is nothing in common between us and the New England people. Mean and petty in their spite, vindictive and malignant in their hatred, and base and cowardly by nature, they are incapable of a magnanimous act or of any of the noble impulses that actuate a warm and generous heart. They tried us once, and found us so hard to conquer that they have feared us ever since, and would now, after a decade of peace, favor any measure that would place collars upon our necks or make galley-slaves of our southern manhood. Their only possible objection to the democratic party is that it favors the freedom and enfranchisement of the Southern States, and that alone is sufficient to damn it forever in the eyes of the New England Yankee. Yet, while we expected nothing patriotic from the radical Yankee, whose very name is the synonym of all that is pusillanimous and sordid in nature, nevertheless we cannot but feel somewhat dejected at the course of New Hampshire on last Tuesday. The people who did the voting are at least human creatures; have the blood of the Anglo-Saxon race coursing in their veins, and are sufficiently intelligent to know that it is a violation of all laws, both human and divine, either to steal or harbor the thieves who are plundering all that is sacred and valuable in their own country.

The radical party has swept like a typhoon over the plains of this broad Union; it has scorched the fields and withered the vegetation; it has defaced the landmarks and destroyed our institutions; it has spit upon our cherished traditions and defied our laws; it has trampled upon our liberties and plundered our treasures; it has shamed us at home and disgraced us abroad; and New Hampshire, after all this, gone radical! Well might we exclaim, Blush thou, O humanity, for another foul crime has been committed in thy fair name! The dark flood of radicalism that has swept over the country for the last ten years has left its stagnant pools only to produce sickness and disease everywhere. The stench and miasma that is arising daily from the putrid filth and decaying mold is nauseating in the extreme. Wail after wail of official corruption has come up from every quarter of the Union. The public funds have been stolen by the million, and the tracks of the thieves traced directly to the White House. An age of peculation and venality such as probably no nation has witnessed since the degenerate days of Caligula and Didius, of the Roman empire, has sprung up here in our midst; and instead of an honor it now has become a reproach to be called an American citizen! Reports that bribery and dishonesty were discovered in the Cabinet and among the highest trustees of the Government electrified the wires and astounded the people from one end of this continent to the other; yet, right upon the heels of these most startling disclosures, New Hampshire indorses the course of an administration that protects and shields the perpetrators of the dark crimes. We verily believe that corruption is one of the strongest bands that holds the republican party together, and the more widespread it is developed the more closely it is determined to stick. Surely the sturdy yeomen of the great West and States like New York cannot indorse such shameless acts.

CONTRACTION THE RUIN OF THE COUNTRY.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, for many reasons I approach the discussion of public questions with apprehension that I will fail to do my duty to my constituency or reflect credit on myself.

In the first place, I am inexperienced in machinery that controls national legislation, know little of its combinations or springs of action.

In the second place, I am one of the representatives of an independent movement emanating from the people.

In the third place, any effort made by me on this floor is in the presence of two powerful organizations: The one in power and, as I think, by their own acts demonstrated incapable, the other out of power, but seeking it with a divided front upon the vital questions most nearly affecting public interest. My education and past alliances all attach me to the democratic party. But, Mr. Chairman, and in this I speak for the people, they must offer a remedy for existing evils before they can secure my support or the support of a movement which, although latent, is powerful. That movement would never have existed had the party in power responded to public necessity. I fear that the political leaders of both the great organizations to which I have referred labor under the common delusion that they lead and control the people.

The first trouble that confronts me in an honest effort to be useful is that all the machinery of both organizations seems to be directed to but one purpose, the defeat of the popular will. It will be my effort to show in the few remarks I have to make that the political leaders of both parties are wrong and that the people are right.

Educated as a democrat, the position of a large number of democratic members of this House in regard to the national banks is, allow me to say, incomprehensible. In the past on every stump in my section of the country I have heard Jackson referred to with pride by almost every democratic political leader. If my recollection serves me right, Jackson fought with the people against the banks and at one and the same time conquered a victory and undying fame as a statesman. We were then comparatively in our infancy, had but few of the material elements of centralization; railroads were doubtful problems and telegraphs were unknown. Our populations were sparse, and therefore the power of class combinations inefficient. He however had the foresight and patriotism to nip in the bud a principle which practically reposed in the Government, in addition to its rightful political power, the absolute control of the money and credits and, through that influence, the industries of the people. To one so little acquainted as myself with the abstractions of finance it strikes me very forcibly that the existing contest is between the national-banking system and what are popularly known as greenbacks.

Let me for a while discuss the merits and demerits of the two systems, and show in my way which is for and which against the people. The national banks, as I understand the laws of their organization, represent the deposition of power by the Government in a class who control the entire moneyed, commercial, trading, manufacturing, labor, and credit interest of the country, with this exception, that the existing authorities retain such control over their administration that their co-operation for political purposes can always be compelled. The disasterous results of such a policy are twofold, crushing out all competition and all diffusion of money, in the first place, and creating an almost impregnable authority in the party in power.

Again, I believe that a fundamental necessity for both prosperity and liberty is the enactment of such laws as look to the decentralization of money and its diffusion among the people. The more competition there is for the sale of any article, to be more elaborate, the more holders, the cheaper the commodity, whatever it may be. This law I hold to be fundamental; therefore, the more you diffuse money the cheaper it becomes to those who by their industry and enterprise make it useful. Active competition in the sale of any article, money included, makes it cheaper to the purchaser. The national banks drive all competition from the market and subject every valuable industry, every labor and mercantile pursuit, everything that looks to the development of the country and the welfare of the people, to the iron rule of money. Such legislation proceeds with one class from the mistaken philosophy that the people lack the brains to attend to their own business. This allow me to denominate as the bourbon or stupid class, and proceeds from another class, wiser, more unscrupulous, and therefore more dangerous, from a desire to dethrone the people and set up the golden calf as the proper object of worship.

A common taunt is that your legislation is for the benefit of debtors. Allow me to depart from what I understand to be the beaten path on this question by asserting that the valuable classes, in almost every prosperous community in this country, are the debtor classes. Destroy them, every factory will close, every country shop and every palace for the distribution of necessities to the people, every enterprise for the development of the country, and every avenue that gives hope for future prosperity is blockaded by an impassable barrier. The banks—national banks—who are advocates of the creditor-class legislation and talk learnedly about specie payment and contraction, are themselves the chief debtor class of the country.

In the campaign of 1872 you cannot fail to remember that those magnates in finance, Jay Cooke & Co., were privately sending information to all parts of the country and publicly making it known from their bank that a change in administration would ruin the country. There was no change in the administration, but the widow failed to get her mite from Jay Cooke & Co. The same advice we heard from Jay Cooke & Co. in 1872 in regard to finance, I am sorry to say, is heard from both sides in this House to-day. The banks closed their doors and surging masses of humanity besieged them day after day to secure their pittance, the result probably of a life of toil, deposited with them because Government had deluded them into the conviction that it was safe. The people were robbed because they were deluded by class legislation, the object and result of all such legislation being to relieve them of the responsibility of thinking and acting for themselves, and swindled them by accepting such legislation as security.

It is not my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to present the data upon which the foregoing conclusions are based; the inefficiency of the national banks has already been exhibited by their inability to weather a financial storm. The financial policy of the Government in contracting the greenback circulation and by legislation discriminating for its depreciation could have had no other object than to perpetuate the national-banking system and was clearly detrimental to the people and country.

The bonds and the circulation depend alike upon the faith in and credit of the Government. Although, as an original proposition and freed from the distressing burdens under which the people groan, the policy of issuing a non-interest-bearing circulation direct from the Treasury of the United States may be a proper subject for honest difference of opinion, when, as now, its contraction has already increased the annual interest many millions and when, as proposed by the so-called resumption act, its objects, accomplished, will further increase it near twenty millions annually, its impolicy is so clearly defined with those unacquainted with the abstractions and, I think, fictions of finance that it needs no argument to demonstrate it.

Having thus briefly presented the foregoing crude, but I think correct, views in regard to national banks and the results that follow their practical opperation, let us for a while consider the political and financial influences that would follow a change of the system by the abolition of the national banks, the unqualified repeal of all discrimination against greenbacks, the substitution of greenbacks for the national-bank issue, and the consequent absorption and cancellation of near four hundred millions of the 5.20 bonds now payable at the option of the Government. And, first, what would be the result of the repeal of all laws discriminating against, and therefore discrediting our circulation? Can it be doubted that a Government carrying a bonded debt of near two thousand millions of dollars, held by the money-loaners of the world at and above par in gold, could, upon the some faith and credit, make a circulation sufficient for internal trade and relieved of existing odious discriminations against it, equal to gold?

One of the abstractions of finance which, Mr. Chairman, I fail to comprehend is the common assertion that the issue of such circulation would result in dangerous centralizing political tendencies. That the opposite result would ensue appears to me apparent to the most common understanding. The money issued from the Treasury of the United States would be diffused among the people freed from all governmental control. The law of diffusion of money into many hands, and the consequent increased number of holders and increased competition in its barter and sale to the people, would force it into legitimate channels of industry.

The national banking laws being repealed, the dangerous power of money and consequent political centralization that follow their existence and present an insurmountable obstacle to usefulness in its legitimate fields will pass away. It is apprehended by many honest people that so sudden a change in so intricate a system would result in widespread disaster. Let us consider its practical operation. It would not disturb decrease or in any way interfere with the volume of circulation, the only result of such legislation being the substitution to every holder of a national-bank note a greenback therefor and the decrease of the interest-bearing debt of the country; time being accorded to banks either to wind up business with their dealers or continue banking as private institutions. If they were safe to depositors under present management, they would have the confidence of the people without laws for their protection. If not safe, the sooner they were compelled to settle the better for private industry. Let me reiterate that the repeal of the laws establishing the national banks and the substitution of greenbacks could not affect money circulation or in any way interfere with the business of the country. The appreciation in the value of greenbacks to par with gold, consequent upon the overthrow of odious legislation depreciating them, would inflate their buying capacity to an amount equal to their depreciation in value on the whole volume, and would approximate $100,000,000. A specie basis would be reached speedily, and the grinding process now fostered by the national banks and the money-holders (rendered effective by the resumption act) be avoided.

It is claimed by advocates of the national banking system that its operation is unprofitable, and under this pretext bills are introduced at this session proposing the repeal of some of the taxes imposed. If this system is unprofitable with power to issue 90 per cent. of the par value of the securities deposited in a circulation and the right to draw 6 per cent. interest semi-annually on the securities, does it not demonstrate that the management is in the hands of reckless speculators and irresponsible combinations? Private banks, where the depositors hold the owner individually responsible for every dollar deposited, have flourished in the past and are in existence in spite of these legal discriminations in the present. The reason of this is apparent upon superficial investigation. The private banker is known by his depositors and is trusted for the reason that they have confidence in his integrity, his business capacity, and his carefulness in the control of his own and the people's money. He engages in no wild-cat speculations, but loans his surplus to those engaged in the useful industrial pursuits surrounding and near to him, while those in charge of the national banks are mere clerks of the stockholders, and are not responsible individually for the people's money.

No such legislation as the Sherman resumption act would have ever been thought of or advocated, were it not that money was injuriously centralized by the influence of national banking legislation, to which may be superadded the existence of colossal fortunes in the few, and principally in commercial centers, which were speedily built in the unnatural condition that the war entailed and by the instrumentality of the national banks. The money thus accumulated in a few hands and controlled by national banks, instead, in the time of financial crisis, of being diffused to meet the necessities of the producing districts of the country, is hoarded in the cities at the first appearance of financial danger. The result is, that while the county districts are in distress for money to carry on the useful pursuits, the cities are gorged with it on account of its easy control through national-bank legislation. Sherman's resumption act is, therefore, legislation prompted by the rich of the cities and the national banks, and is legislation diametrically antagonistic to every producing district and industrial interest in the land.

The panic of 1873, which so shook the confidence of the country that these money lords and national shaving-shops withdrew the money from all useful pursuits, was the direct result of the accumulation of money in the cities by this legislation. By operation of the banking laws the reserves of the country banks could only be profitably used by sending them to the redemption cities. Vast sums were thus accumulated beyond the legitimate demands of trade, which in seeking employment created the wild spirit of stock speculation that produced the disaster. Worthless stocks had absorbed near one hundred millions of the money of the country, and when the crash came and their worthlessness was exhibited, the confidence of the national banks and the money-holders was destroyed; and from that time until now they have withheld and locked up a surplus, thus driven to the cities, and while the people of the country districts and the industrial pursuits are destroyed for want of a sufficient circulation. This surplus in the cities, which should be driven to the country to engage in productive enterprise, was the instrument used in this House to pass SHERMAN'S resumption act, perpetuate a policy of contraction, and destroy the hopes and energies of a generation.

Under the cry of hard money, hard money, a large number of gentlemen assail the greenback, which cost the people nothing, and advocate the national-bank circulation, which under SHERMAN'S resumption act will cost the people forty millions per annum. For hard money they offer the people the notes of these national shaving-shops, and make an annual charge against them for their perpetuation of the sum of $40,000,000.

A large number of this class are not in favor of hard money, but under cover of a hard-money cry are agents of and stockholders in national banks. We find on all financial questions that both the great parties are divided. Gentlemen professing to be democrats are the advocates of this overshadowing money monopoly, when every inspiration of democracy and every precept and example of its founders arraign such legislation as the enemy of its principles, and dangerous to public liberty.

The corner-stone of the independent party is hostility to all corporate monopolies. In this they are the exponents of true democratic principles and the lineal successors of Jefferson and Jackson. No man can be a democrat and at the same time advocate this national banking system. It may be said by some that a hard-money policy is one of the fundamental tenets of democracy. A democrat, as I understand the term, is one who believes in the people; believes in their power and their ability to govern themselves; believes, when acting in a representative capacity as a legislator, that the highest duty is to protect their material interests and defend their political rights; who believes that when the people are in one of the balances and the Shylocks with their money-bags are in the other demanding the pound of flesh nearest the heart of the people, it is his duty, if need be, in the interest of the people to confiscate the unlawful gains of the greedy sharpers. The advocates of the national banking system and Sherman's resumption act are their representatives, and the advocates of the substitution of the greenback for them are the defenders and supporters of the people.

To further establish the ruinous tendency of national-bank and contraction rule, allow me to call the attention of the House and the country to the annexed table, taken from the commercial-agency report of Dunn, Barlow & Co., showing the failures and the amounts involved from the year 1857 up to the first quarter of the year 1876, inclusive:

Year.	Number.	Amount.	Average.
1857	4,932	$291,750,000	$59,154
1858	4,225	95,749,000	22,662
1859	3,913	64,394,000	16,430
1860	3,673	79,807,000	21,710
1861	6,993	207,210,000	29,631
1862	1,652	23,049,300	13,452
1863	485	6,864,700	14,154
1864	520	8,579,000	16,498
1865	530	17,625,000	33,255
1866	632	47,333,000	74,894
1867	2,386	86,218,000	36,134
1868	2,608	63,774,000	24,452
1869	2,799	75,054,000	26,814
1870	3,551	88,242,000	24,849
1871	2,915	85,252,000	29,245
1872	4,069	121,056,000	29,750
1873	5,183	228,499,000	44,685
1874	5,830	155,239,000	26,627
1875	7,740	201,060,353	25,978
1st quarter 1876	2,806	64,644,156	23,037

This table shows that if the same proportion of failures occurs the remainder of this year they will aggregate 11,224 in number, with $258,500,000 in amount, the failures in number on the proportion of the first quarter of this year being over twenty times greater in number than in the years 1863, 1864, 1865, and 1866, and nearly double as great in number as those of 1861, which were the result of the secession of one-third of the whole territory and the insecurity produced by the inauguration of the most gigantic struggle of modern times—in numbers exceeding double the failures of 1857, the most disastrous year of American history prior to 1861.

The most serious question now confronting the industrial and business classes of this country is this: Shall a contraction of the currency go on, or shall it cease? Already nearly $40,000,000 have been retired from actual circulation since the passage of the resumption act, January 14, 1875; and Treasurer New reports that the volume of the currency will be contracted over $100,000,000 by January 1, 1877. What does this mean? Sir, it means an increase in the burden of public debt; an increase in the weight of taxes; embarrassment to private credit; a reduction in the operation of agriculture and manufactures; a check to the development and improvement of the country; a blow at every productive industry in the land.

It means further, an increase in the value of money and a decrease in proportion in the value of the products of labor. It means dear and scarce money, high interest, and low products. It means paralysis and death to all business and all pursuits save that of the money-loaner, the Wall-street gambler, and the bondholder.

Have we not unmistakable evidences of the ruinous tendencies of this contraction policy every day? Were there ever so many failures since the formation of our Government? Were there ever so many men, so many old and long-established firms, going down under this terrible and crushing contraction policy? and while thousands have gone down, many thousands more are to-day hanging on the ragged edge and must soon follow. The end is not yet. We have not touched bottom. This grinding process will continue until the policy is changed. Contraction must cease, or hopeless bankruptcy is the lot of the great mass of our citizens. This contraction was a forced one, and did not take place because the prices of articles fell, but it was the cause of the fall of prices. It was not brought about because there was less demand for money, but it came (or was brought upon us) at a time when our internal developments were greater than ever before in history, our population increasing more rapidly, more railroads building, more mines opening, and more improvements of every kind than we ever witnessed before. It came when the growing wants of the country required a larger circulation.

Who brought contraction? Surely not the toiling millions, that received the rewards of their labor from these enterprises that were then developing our latent resources. Surely not the agricultural classes, then never more prosperous; for they remembered the lesson taught by Adam Smith in his work on political economy, when he said, "High prices and plenty are prosperity; low prices and want are misery." No, sir; the masses did not demand it; they did not want it. It has ruined them; and they now feel and know that it is so. Who did bring contraction? I answer, the national bankers, the bondholders, the money-shavers, and their hired attorneys. They have done it; and now with their hand upon the throat of the nation, they cry: "Let it go on! Stop it not until the last Treasury note (greenback or people's money) shall be retired and burned up!"

To this demand of the Shylocks for this life-blood of the nation, what say the two old political parties now in possession of the two branches of Congress? The democratic all powerful in the House, the republicans equally powerful in the Senate. Do or have they heeded the wants of the people, or do they bow and cringe like slaves at the feet of this heartless money tyrant? Let their action for the last long distressing five months answer. During the last six months, five of which we have been in session, the number of failures has been fifty-two hundred and eleven, and the liabilities $135,000,000. With these things staring Congress in the face, I ask has there been a solitary bill or resolution passed either branch of Congress putting an end to this contraction? Tell me, ye powers that be, and who demand the suffrages of the people that you may longer exist, why have you not acted? At any time within ten days from the opening of Congress in December last a bill could have passed immediately stopping contraction. Why did you not do it? I answer, because you were both cowardly; because you were under the shadow of the money power; because that power had collars around your parties' necks, and led, guided, and drove you with a very slender thread, without the least fear that you would become unruly or break away from them. I answer again, because you wanted their help and the help of their money in the coming campaign.

And now you have chosen your ground, you have made up the record, you have both shown by your action that you are willing for contraction and bankruptcy to go on until they consummate the certain destruction of the business pursuits of the country.

I say to gentlemen of both the old political parties that we, the independents, will hold you to the record you have made on this question, and are ready to join battle and go to the country for a verdict. No honeyed words or phrases, no false or hypocritical promises made to the ear and to be broken to the hope, no two-horse bare-back riding, no political clap-trap or legerdemain, no uncertain or devious future action, no two-construction double-action resolution, no—

> Wiring in and wiring out,
> Leaving the people still in doubt
> Whether the snake, that made the track,
> Is going north or coming back, which doubtless will adorn and beautify both your platforms, will satisfy the people.

In conclusion, what, then, is the condition of the country? Its great productive powers at a stand-still; general depression in all legitimate and fair business; bankruptcy knocking at every man's door; the tax-gatherer reaching out his hand for our annual contribution, to be given in payment for the right to enjoy the highest taxation known to any people on earth; the great masses of our industrial and business classes weighed down by heavy debts, with 10 per cent. interest paid semi-annually, eating up the profits and much of the principal; taxation so great that thousands of farmers are compelled to allow their lands to be knocked down to the State for taxes; real estate greatly reduced in value, and with difficulty sales are effected at reduced rates; its yield to the cultivator less than 3 per cent., but little in excess of the taxes, because capital is protected by legislation that exempts it from the burdens of taxation; millions of men and women to-day in this free Republic without work and without bread, the most rigid economy having forced itself upon the great producing and laboring classes, until to-day many are unable to earn the necessities of life.

In this condition of affairs what do the people demand? Sir, they want the burdens on labor lessened. They want better pay for the farmer, mechanic, and laborer. They want employment for thousands of idle men and women. They want to live and to let live. They want lower interest on capital. They want less taxation and robbery and more honesty and economy in public affairs. They want no more legislation to enrich the few, whose coffers are already overflowing, at the expense of the masses, who are poor. They want no conflict between capital and labor; but they demand that capital shall be subordinate to labor, its creator, and that legislation shall look to the encouragement of blood, bone, and muscle, and not to the protection of money. They want no more grasping monopolies created and fostered by State or nation. They want "equal and exact justice to all; special privileges to none." They want no more increase of salaries or offices, but a reduction of both. They want to turn out a host of useless officers that now consume their substance, and remand them to honest and productive pursuits. They want less and better legislation. They want to hold public officials to a strict accountability, and teach them they are the servants, the people the masters. They want to place men in power whose sole aim will not be money-making; who will not enrich the few, the moneyed classes, and themselves out of the hard earnings of labor. They want to be governed less, that they may follow their peaceful, healthful, and useful pursuits in their own way, freed from the extortions of legislative monopolies and the plundering rings that such legislation creates. They want no splendid or magnificent government. They want no towering public edifices, built from the hard earnings of industry and toil. They want no rich trappings surrounding Government officials at the expense of an impoverished people. But they do want a plain, simple Government, that will make them realize that it is a blessing, not a curse. They ask these things in the name of common justice, and they will have them though the heavens fall.

And last, though not least, they demand financial reform by the adoption of a policy that will re-invigorate the prostrate industrial and business pursuits of the country. The people demand a currency stable, uniform, and receivable for all debts, public and private. They want all financial legislation that discriminates in favor of the wealthy and against the many repealed. They want greenbacks in place of national-bank notes. They want no forced resumption of specie payments brought about by a forced contraction of the currency. They want no increase of the bonded indebtedness. While they realize that the public debt must be paid, they at the same time demand that their interests be protected from the grasp of the money-sharks.

And now, Mr. Chairman, as one of the representatives of a new and powerful political organization antagonizing the two old parties on the financial question, I desire to remind this House that already two great States of the West, untrammeled by old political ties, have assembled in convention under the banner of the independent movement, and have spoken in no uncertain tone for the unconditional and speedy repeal of the ruinous Sherman resumption act. Yes, Mr. Chairman, repeal unconditionally and at once, that contraction may cease, that the greenback or non-interest-bearing debt shall not be changed into an interest-bearing debt, that enforced idleness by unwise legislation shall no longer exist, but that business, through its repeal, now paralyzed by it, shall resume throughout the land.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the people of the Northwest demand substantially the changes in financial policy indicated in the remarks I have made, and I now warn both the old political organizations on this floor that, like Banquo's ghost, they will not down; that they cannot ignore this financial question; equivocate or double deal with it as you may, it will come to the front; that any attempt to cheat the people on this issue will create a storm of indignation throughout the country, and swell the ranks of the new party, already powerful, and bear it on to victory. The people, of right, ought to rule. It is their edict that the despotism of money shall cease, and public servants will be compelled to obey, or retire for others that will.

I appeal to gentlemen on both sides of the House to rise above party on this question; cease this wrangling over party and President-making, and pass such financial legislation as will give relief to a people now bowed down by the weight of excessive debts and taxes. The country is tired of listening to useless discussions of questions that tend to inflame the public mind, and that for political purposes only, and questions about which the people do not care to be disturbed.

Then let us rise to the full dignity of the occasion, and meet the demands of the country in this hour of financial distress and bankruptcy.

Mr. FOSTER. I yield twenty minutes of my time to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. WALDRON.]

Mr. WALDRON. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Appropriation Committee, I differ with a majority of my colleagues as to material provisions of this bill. I am satisfied that it will not provide the means which are necessary to carry on with efficiency and success the work of the Post-Office Department for the ensuing fiscal year; and I shall occupy a few moments in the effort to demonstrate that fact.

There is no Department of the Government in whose operations the great body of the American people are more interested than in those of the Post-Office Department. It reaches every hamlet, every business, I might say every home in the land, and the Congress of the United States should be loath to cripple and impair a service which is so intimately connected with every social relation and business interest.

The framers of this bill, realizing what are the temper and feeling of the people with reference to mail facilities, have inserted a section which reads as follows:

> SEC. 14. That no post-office or service on any mail-route necessary for the public service and required for the proper and efficient distribution of the mails shall be discontinued.

This sounds well, but, in the absence of necessary appropriations, means nothing. The Postmaster-General can only maintain post-offices and mail service as we provide the money. He must adjust the service so as to bring its cost within the amount we appropriate, and it is childish to say to him that he must maintain post-offices and mail service at the same time that we have left him without money to pay postmasters or contractors.

For the purpose, Mr. Chairman, of showing how inadequate the proposed appropriation is to the efficient working of the Department, I call the attention of the committee, not only to the estimates of the Postmaster-General, an officer whose integrity and capacity are unquestioned, but I shall cite the actual expenditures of the past year, the year closing on the 30th of June, 1875, as indicating by comparison what is required for the year ending 30th of June, 1877. And I shall further allow all deductions which are the result of the changes and retrenchment which the bill before us contemplates, although I believe that some of them are more radical and sweeping than are consistent with the well-being and efficiency of the service.

The two items which make up the bulk of the appropriations under this bill are the items of salaries of postmasters and of pay for transportation of the mails. These two items constitute over two-thirds of the entire amount covered by this bill. Now, the amount asked by the Postmaster-General for compensation of postmasters for the next fiscal year was $7,500,000. The amount appropriated by the last House for the present fiscal year was $7,500,000 and the amount appropriated by this bill is $6,500,000, being a million less than the estimate of the Postmaster-General and a million less than was appropriated for the present year, and this, too, in the face of the fact that the operations of the Department and its cost, keeping pace with the increase of population and business, are augmented annually from 6 to 8 per cent.

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that this bill proposes a large reduction in the salaries of postmasters of a certain class. In reference to that I will only say that I have generally sustained the committee of which I am a member in their effort to reduce salaries. I recognize the demand of the times for economy and retrenchment. I may add that the Appropriation Committee is unanimous in recommending a reduction of salaries of the better-paid postmasters. The Postmaster-General, in the same spirit, submitted a plan for the adjustment of salaries of postmasters of the first, second, and third classes, which is an average reduction of 12 per cent. and involves a saving of $400,000; but the bill before us cuts much deeper. Its plan for adjusting salaries makes a reduction of 22 per cent. and involves a saving of $800,000.

Now, it must be kept in mind that the salary of a postmaster is not his net compensation. I can say for the district I represent that there is not a post-office in it where the allowance for clerk-hire is equal to the salary of the clerks actually employed. The postmaster is obliged to take from his salary enough to make up the deficiency.

There is also the responsibility for considerable sums of money, for which the postmaster gives bond, to be taken into account. And without going into other details, I am satisfied that the reduction, proposed by the Department is a fair and feasible reduction which I trust will be adopted in place of that suggested by the committee.

But, even on the basis of the committee's proposition, the sum named in the bill as compensation for postmasters is entirely inadequate; and in support of that statement I give the figures.

The amount actually expended for compensation to postmasters during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, was, omitting fractions, $7,049,935. Add 12 per cent., which is a low estimate for the natural increase for two years in the business of the Department, $845,992, and we have a total of $7,895,927 as the amount which would be required under existing law. Deduct $800,000 as the saving resulting from the plan of the committee and it leaves $7,095,927, or about $600,000 more than the bill proposes to appropriate.

But we have other evidence drawn from the actual payments for the present fiscal year. We are now within sixty days of its termination. The Department can now approximate closely to the aggregate of this item, and it is now evident that the sum due postmasters for the year ending next month will be $7,800,000, making a deficiency of $300,000 to be supplied for the present fiscal year.

The sum therefore named in this bill as compensation for postmasters for next year is $1,300,000 short of the amount actually expended this year; and, allowing for increase corresponding with past years, it will be short to the amount of a million and a half at least, against which is to be credited a deduction of $800,000 if the new plan of adjustment proposed by the committee is adopted.

And yet in the face of these results the Postmaster-General is admonished by this bill that he must not discontinue any post-office necessary for the public service.

This increase, year by year, of compensation to postmasters is a gratifying and creditable exhibit in the operations of the Department, because the emoluments of a postmaster depend on the receipts of his office and an increase of compensation indicates a corresponding increase of the revenues.

And now I come to the other item of compensation, that for transportation of the mail. The Department estimates the cost of this item for the next year at $17,500,000. It paid out for this service over $16,000,000 in the year ending June 30, 1873, and it paid out over $18,000,000 in the year ending June 30, 1874. This bill appropriates for that service for next year $14,500,000, being three millions less than the estimate of the Department and four millions less than the amount actually expended two years ago.

I know it is claimed that the proposed scheme of paying the railroads by space instead of weight will result in a saving, but that saving is not estimated to exceed half a million, and it may not be anything. The change in the mode of payment—paying the railroads for the space occupied—is a sensible change, alike just to the Government and the railroads, but it is an experiment as yet untried. Assuming, however, that this change results in a saving of half a million, the question naturally arises, Where is the retrenchment, the reduction, the reform, which is to save two millions and a half more? The answer is a plain one. This amount is to be saved at the cost and sacrifice of our mail facilities. First of all this bill strikes down the "fast mail" between New York and Chicago—a mail which gives to the business men of Chicago their eastern correspondence in the morning before business hours, when under the old schedule time it came in the afternoon and was delivered the next morning, making actually the difference of a day. I cite Chicago only as an illustration of its advantages. The same benefit accrues to the entire Northwest, which has its mail connections at Chicago. It yields similar advantages to the States of Ohio, Michigan, and Indiana, whose mails radiate from Cleveland, Toledo, and other points on its route. It brings to Boston and New York its western mail a day in advance of the former time. The entire North from Maine to Nebraska is interested in this enterprise. It is an achievement of which the Post-Office officials and the contractors may be justly proud. Our people have become accustomed to its facilities, and in this progressive country they are not inclined to forego them.

The amount saved by the discontinuance of the "fast mails" and a return to the former slow mail-trains is estimated by the Department to be $395,000; and, if there is to be a reduction of two millions more from the estimates of the Department, it is evident what the result is.

Mr. Chairman, this House and the country may as well understand that this bill, if adopted as reported, means the curtailment of its mail facilities. I do not believe that the country is prepared for any such result, and I shall at the proper time propose such amendments to this bill as will meet the demands of the times and the wants of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. FOSTER. I now yield the residue of my time to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.]

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to speak upon this bill for the mere purpose of talking, and I do not know that I shall be able to make myself fully understood by the House in the time I have; but believing as I do, from a necessarily hasty consideration of this bill since it was reported, that it is vicious in many particulars, I should fail to do my duty to myself or to my constituents if I did not call attention to some of its provisions.

In the first place it contains proposed legislation that is not just and equitable, and which, if passed, will return in my opinion to haunt the men who voted for it. I refer now to the proposed legislation to pay railways by space exclusively instead of by weight, or by both weight and space, which last I think the better way.

Again, it cuts down the estimates of the Postmaster-General in round numbers $5,750,000; and one of two things is true, either that the Department since the foundation of the Government down to the present time has been full of swindling and stealing, or else that this is an improper reduction.

It is well enough to inquire briefly as to that matter, because if in fact we can maintain this mail service for $5,750,000 less than is estimated, and less in proportion than it has been maintained since the organization of the Department, we ought to do it, and find out where this stealing and this leakage, if any, have been. If, on the contrary, that cannot be done, then we ought to appropriate enough money to run this Department properly.

It may be true that the Committee on Appropriations, or, in this case, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who reports this bill, has found out some patent-right way and manner in which he can run this Department cheaper that anybody else ever could do. If so, I hope he will call our attention to it when he comes to speak upon this bill; otherwise, I hope gentlemen on both sides of the House will give enough consideration to this subject to do what is right.

I need not inform this House that nearly two-thirds of this body is composed of members belonging to the democratic party; everybody knows that. Now, if that party be the pure and honest organization that its members claim it to be, the honest, pure party that you on the other side claim it to have been through all time up to the present moment, then I suppose that when you administered the Post-Office Department all the time you had possession of the Government you administered it economically. So let me very briefly, as a matter of interest, call attention to the expenditures and revenues in the Post-Office Department during the last years that the democratic party was in power, and also to the deficiencies of the Department during that time.

In 1860 the revenues of the Post-Office Department, according to an official table which I have before me, were in round numbers $8,500,000, and the expenditures of that Department for that year were $19,170,000; so the expenditures were over $10,652,000 more than the revenues, and the Treasury grant over $11,154,000. There was a larger deficit that year by nearly $4,000,000, as shown by the Treasury grant, than there has been in any year since the foundation of the Government.

Ah, but gentlemen may say that there was between three and four millions of dollars of that deficit that came over as a deficiency from 1859. That is true, and it is but fair and proper the same should be stated. But you may take the two years of 1859 and 1860, when the democratic party was in power and had possession of the Government, and there was appropriated by grant out of the Treasury, as shown officially from the table before me, $15,800,000 to make up the deficiency in that Department for those two years. You cannot point to any other two years in the history of the Government that shew the same condition of things. Yet we are told in the papers and throughout the country and in this House about the extravagance of the Post-Office Department as administered since the republican party came in power in 1861.

Now, if you please, take the years 1874 and 1875 and aggregate the deficiencies in the Post-Office Department, and which are the largest since 1860 and which were covered by grants out of the Treasury, and you will find the deficiency was in round numbers over $3,000,000 less than the deficiency of 1859 and 1860, when the reform democratic party, the clean-handed party, had possession of the Government. Then look also at the difference in the amount of service performed in 1860 as compared with 1874 and 1875. In 1860 there was not a single free-delivery office in the United States; there was not a money-order office in the United States. In 1860 it took from four to five days to carry a letter from the city of New York to the city of Saint Louis. In 1860 there was not a railway post-office in the United States; all the mails had to go through the distributing offices and be there delayed. Ay, more than that; in 1860 there were in round numbers only 27,000 miles of railway mail-routes.

How is it now? In 1870 the official tables show that the increase in the revenues of the Post-Office Department over 1860 was $11,000,000, or 132 per cent., while the increase in expenditures was less than $5,000,000, or only 25 per cent. Yet at that time the country had gone through a great war. Besides, in 1860 business was conducted upon a gold basis; in 1870 it was upon a paper basis, with a great advance in the price of labor, of transportation, and of everything else; yet you have this showing.

In 1875 there were 70,000 miles of railway mail-routes against 27,000 miles in 1860. In 1875 you had the fast-mail trains, the railway post-office, the money-order office, and the free-delivery system, all of which we did not have in 1860. Yet we have now not only a far less percentage of cost according to mail service done, but a far less actual deficiency than in 1860.

Now, you gentlemen, after you have been out of power for fifteen years, with this record staring you in the face, the last record that you made when you were in power and had possession of the Government, are swift to run and fly to reform the postal service. Be careful, gentlemen, or, in the language of the sucker, you "will advance backward." Do not ruin the service; do not cut it down; do not cripple it; do not go to work by your penny-wise and pound-foolish policy to destroy it. In other words, do not make it that enormously expensive inefficient Department that it was in 1860, when its cost for that year was $10,500,000 more than its revenues; for the people have got used to it; they pay for it, and like it; and go back to the old pod-auger expensive system if you dare.

I desire here to call attention to the following official table, showing the revenues and expenditures of the Department since the year 1836, and the excess of expenditures over receipts as shown by Treasury grants:

J. M. McGREW, Auditor.

OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR OF THE TREASURY FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, October 22, 1875.

Perhaps it would be interesting in this connection, at least instructive, to see what was the cause in 1860, and most of the time subsequently, of the deficiency in the Post-Office Department; because if we can get at the cause and remedy it, then we would act wisely. In the fiscal year of 1860 the deficit was $10,652,000; in 1861 it was $5,257,000; in the fiscal year of 1862, the first year of republican administration, it was $2,825,000; in 1863 it was $150,000; in 1864 it was $206,000; and in 1865, the year the war closed, with gold at a large premium, with the Department reaching its arms all over the North and West, and this, too, with an unprecedented advance in price of labor and material, the revenues exceeded the expenditures by $861,000. In five short years the Department advanced from $10,600,000 on the debit side of the ledger to $861,000 on the credit side.

Mr. ATKINS. What was the difference in the number of mail-routes?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will speak of that matter in a moment, and will speak of it fairly. As I say, the Department advanced in five years from a deficit of $10,000,000 to a credit of $861,000 out of its revenues alone.

Now, I want to treat this question fairly. The gentleman asks the difference in the routes. I reply that the railway routes had increased but the star service had decreased, because during the war of course the whole service failed in the South outside of the Union lines, and on the 30th of June, 1865, it had not been restored to any considerable extent. But after the war, when it was determined that we were to live together and be one united country, it was the policy of the Government to re-establish those post-routes, to give postal facilities all over the South as well as over the North and the West. In pursuance of that policy, the Department went to work, and year by year as the service was put upon your great rivers and your small rivers, as the star service was re-established, and as the railway mail service was re-established in the South, the deficit began to grow again; and right there you have the true solution of the deficit in the Post-Office Department, not by mere word of mouth, but by figures "strong as proof of holy writ" it is proved that the cause of the deficit in the expenditures of the Post-Office Department over and above its revenues is the unprofitable (I mean in dollars and cents) mail service in the Southern States. I do not speak of this to find objection. God knows I would not take away one mile of mail service that is necessary for the South or the great West, or any portion of the country. I am glad you have this service. I want you to have all you need. I want every part of the country supplied with proper mail facilities, to be paid for, not extravagantly but fairly. Still there is the fact when the mail service was in operation in the South before the war, in 1860 the deficit was $10,600,000; after it was discontinued in the South it grew less year by year until in 1865 there was no deficit, but, on the contrary, $861,000 profit. And as the mail service was restored in the South after 1865 the deficiency in a sufficient amount of revenues therefrom to pay therefor has year by year grown up.

Not as a politician, but in all fairness and candor, coming from the great West as I do, I want to ask the gentlemen on the other side of the House, especially from the South, whether they propose to follow blindly the lead of the Committee on Appropriations to cut down and impair this mail service which it has been the policy of the Government under all parties to build up and sustain? A cutting down is what this bill means. You may talk about extravagance in the Post-Office Department; you may say that if you had charge of it, you could run it for $5,750,000 less annually. That sort of thing will do when you are making speeches upon the stump, if you want to fool your constituents, and they want to be fooled; but it is not worth while to talk such nonsense here. Five million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars taken from the post-office appropriation bill means less efficient and valuable service to that extent, the burden of which must fall in the main on the South and the West.

Now, I do not feel that I come from the far West. Illinois for a long time was called a part of the great West, but it is now pretty near the center; and with the teeming millions of industrious men and women in that State the postal service there at last is about self-sustaining. But I will tell you what is the fact: it never would have been self-sustaining upon those great prairies but for the liberal policy of the Government in building them up; it never would have been self-sustaining but for a free and industrious people who demanded these facilities, and from this time forward the service will pay a profit. I would extend that policy toward the Territories; I would extend it toward the South. I would let the means of knowledge for the whole people be distributed efficiently and rapidly, especially in the poorer districts, for they need it most. It should float upon the river, run upon the steam-car, and fly upon the lightning.

Thus I might continue to show the increase in the efficiency of this Department and the great ability, skill, and economy with which it has been managed, especially since 1868; and while some gentlemen sigh for the good old times when the revenues of the Department exceeded the expenditures, when the horn of the stage-driver was heard in the distance arousing the ambition of all the boys to some time become stage-drivers, and when postage was twenty-five cents on each letter; yet I do not think it is policy to travel in that direction; and in this connection let me say to gentlemen that the mail matter now conveyed by the Department every year exceeds the aggregate of all the matter that passed through the mails for the first fifty years after the establishment of the Department. But as my time is limited, I must pass on to other matters, hoping that I have said enough to call the attention of gentlemen to the magnitude of this service, and how deeply interested all the people everywhere are in the same, and that it is not right, nor even temporarily politic, to cut off appropriations for the same to the extent of $5,750,000, as proposed by this bill.

COMPARISON OF THE BUSINESS OF THE DEPARTMENT IN 1860 WITH 1870 AND 1875.

Before I pass from this branch of the discussion, I want to call attention to a tabular statement compiled with great care from official sources, a statement showing expenditures and revenues and service of the Department in the years 1860, 1870, and 1875, and the percentage of increase since 1860, especially calling attention that the increase in the revenues of the Department in 1875 over the revenues in 1860 is 213.11 per cent., while the increase in the expenditures is only 75.32 per cent.

The table speaks for itself, showing the progress of the Department and the more economical and efficient management of the Department in 1870 and 1875 than in 1860, and needs no comment from me.

Statement showing the percentage of increase or decrease on the following items of mail service between the years 1860 and 1870, 1870 and 1875, and 1860 and 1875.

INCREASE OF BUSINESS OF DEPARTMENT SINCE 1868.

I also desire to call attention more fully to the enormous increase in the service of the Department since the fiscal year 1868 (the last year of Johnson's administration) under the efficient administration of the Department by Mr. Creswell from 1869 to 1874 inclusive, and the present Postmaster-General, Governor Jewell; and taking into consideration the increase in the amount and efficiency of the service, as well as legislation had and law in force, after full examination and comparison I am justified in saying that at no time in the history of the Department has it been so wisely, vigorously, and economically conducted as since 1868. It will be noticed that the length of railroad routes alone increased from 36,000 miles in the year 1868 to 67,700 miles in 1874, and 70,000 in 1875, and notwithstanding the legislation of 1873 increasing compensation to railroads, and the almost proportionate increase of other mail facilities and business, that the grants paid out of the Treasury for deficit in the Department of expenditures over revenues was over $1,600,000 less in 1870 than in 1868, over $1,500,000 less in 1871 than in 1868, over $700,000 less in 1872 than in 1868, less than $300,000 more in 1873 than in 1868, about $225,000 more in 1874 than in 1868, and $1,000,000 more in 1875 than in 1868; and as a matter of interest, as well as information and accuracy, I furnish a tabular statement showing the percentage of increase in postal service for the years 1868 to 1875 inclusive:

GROWTH OF MONEY-ORDER SYSTEM SINCE 1868.

I also call attention to the growth of the money-order system since 1868, from 1,223 money-order post-offices, issuing $16,000,000 in the aggregate of money-orders at a net profit of $54,000. There was in 1875 3,401 money-order offices, issuing in the aggregate over $79,000,000 of money-orders at a net profit of over $140,000, and increasing in number from 832,000 in 1868 to 5,700,000 in 1875. I append a statement showing percentage of increase accurately from 1868 to 1875 inclusive:

FREE-DELIVERY SYSTEM.

I desire also to more particularly call attention to a table showing the increase in number of free-delivery cities since 1868 to 1875 inclusive. From forty-eight they have been increased to eighty-seven, and from a delivery of 78,000,000 of letters by carriers in 1868, 228,000,000 were delivered in 1875, and almost a like number in round numbers collected, as well as millions of papers and postal cards; and the revenues from local postage have so grown that this system, besides its many advantages otherwise, was self-sustaining in 1875, and I have no doubt will continue so to be in the future.

FOREIGN MAIL SERVICE.

I desire also to call attention to the great reduction in foreign postage since 1868, which, in 1868, was from 24 cents to 45 cents to different countries for a single letter of one-half ounce, and has been gradually reduced until it is now uniform at 5 cents; also, the great reduction of pay to steamships for carrying the mails, they receiving at the rate of 55 cents an ounce for this service in 1868 and now receiving, with better and more expeditious service, at the rate of 3⅜ cents an ounce, a saving to the Department of 51⅛ cents an ounce in transportation alone; and I want to call attention to the fact that these great economical measures were brought about under legislation that gave the Postmaster-General full and discretionary power to make the best bargain he could in the premises, and to see what a marked difference there is in this service when the Postmaster-General had this power and in the star service in which the Postmaster-General has been fettered by mandatory legislation, cutting off his discretion and power to let the service except by certain inflexible rules, and under which the system of straw-bidding grew up in the star service against the protest of the Postmaster-General, he giving notice in his reports to Congress year after year of this straw-bidding and asking for legislation under which the same could be prevented, and which legislation up to this time Congress has failed to give. This reform in the foreign mail service was commenced by the late Postmaster-General Creswell and largely brought about under his administration, and has been completed by Governor Jewell, our present very efficient and vigilant Postmaster-General.

The power of the Postmaster-General to make postal conventions with foreign governments is as follows:

The Postmaster-General, by and with the advice and consent of the President of the United States, shall be, and he hereby is, authorized to reduce or enlarge from time to time the rates of postage upon all letters and other mailable matter conveyed between the United States and any foreign country, for the purpose of making better postal arrangements with other governments or counteracting any adverse measures affecting our postal intercourse with foreign countries. Act of March 3, 1851, 9 Statutes, section 2, page 589. See also Revised Statutes, section 398, page 66.)

And the power to make foreign mail contracts is as follows:

It shall not be lawful for the Postmaster-General to make any steamship or other new contract for carrying the mails on the sea for a longer period than two years, nor for any other compensation than the sea and inland postages on the mails so transported. (Act of June 14, 1858, 11 Statutes, section 4, page 364.)

The Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to cause the mails to be transported between the United States and any foreign port or ports, or between any port of the United States to any other port of the United States, touching at a foreign port, by steamship, allowing and paying therefor, if by an American vessel, the sea and United States inland postage, and, if by a foreign vessel, the sea postage only on the mails so conveyed: Provided, That the preference shall always be given to an American over a foreign steamship when departing from the same port for the same destination within three days of each other. (Act of June 15, 1860, 12 Statutes, section 4, page 39.)

The provisions of the fourth section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1861," approved June 15, 1860, are hereby modified so as to authorize the Postmaster-General to cause the mails to be transported between the United States and any foreign port or ports, or between ports of the United States, touching at a foreign port, by steamship, allowing and paying therefor, if by an American vessel, any sum not exceeding the sea and United States inland postage, and, if by a foreign vessel, any sum not exceeding the sea postage on the mails so conveyed. (Act of March 3, 1865, 13 Statutes, section 9, page 506. See also Revised Statutes, section 4009, page 779.)

And now I will give a short statement in detail of the action of the Department under this legislation and pass to the consideration of other matters.

Previous to January 1, 1868, the following single rates of postage were charged on letters from the United States to Europe:

	Cents.

Austria	28

and the sea rate paid to steamships for the transportation of the letter mails to Europe was 16 cents per single rate, equal to 55 cents an ounce.

On January 1, 1868, under the provisions of new postal conventions, the international letter rates of postage between the United States and Great Britain were reduced from 24 to 12 cents, and a corresponding reduction effected of about 50 per cent. in letter rates of postage to the other European countries. The Atlantic sea rate paid to steamships for transporting the mails to Europe, was likewise reduced to 20 cents an ounce for letters and 6 cents a pound for other mail matter, and the principle adopted that the country dispatching the mails should make its own arrangements for the mails dispatched by it, and pay the expenses of the Atlantic transportation.

On January 1, 1870, modified postal conventions went into effect, further reducing the rate of letter postage to Great Britain from 12 to 6 cents, and also reducing in like proportion rates of postage to other countries of Europe. By these conventions the sea postage was further reduced from 20 to 6 cents an ounce for letter mails.

The Cunard, Inman, Bremen, and Hamburg steamship lines, previously employed in transporting the mails to Europe, declined to transport the mails after January 1, 1870, at the reduced rate of compensation, and the service was for a short time interrupted. The Postmaster-General and superintendent of foreign mails went to New York and succeeded in breaking up the combination formed by these four lines, by making new arrangements for a semi-weekly service by the Williams and Guion and Bremen lines, which was soon followed by an arrangement for an additional weekly trip by the Hamburg line, thus securing a regular tri-weekly dispatch of mails by steamers of approved speed at the reduced rates of compensation. Subsequently all the lines consented to carry mails at the reduced rates.

The Atlantic mail-steamship service was from January 1, 1874, organized on the improved plan adopted by Postmaster-General Creswell, of accepting the fastest steamers offered for the mail service on each sailing day, taking into account in making selections of steamers the elements of speed, certainty, and security, by which arrangement the fastest steamers only of all the different lines have been employed and the best possible mail service secured for the compensation of the sea postages only. The British government has decided to adopt the same plan after the 1st of January next, the date of the expiration of existing subsidy contracts made by the British post-office.

The general postal union treaty, concluded at Berne, October 9, 1874, between twenty-two countries, comprising the United States, the whole of Europe, Asiatic Turkey, Asiatic Russia, and Egypt, went into operation on July 1, 1875. Under this treaty a uniform postage rate for prepaid letters of 5 cents was established to each of the above-named countries, and the Atlantic sea postage reduced to 6 francs 50 centimes per kilogram for letters and to 50 centimes per kilogram for other mail matter; equal to $3\frac{3}{5}$ cents per ounce for letters, and $4\frac{4}{5}$ cents per pound for other matter.

The different steamship companies employed in transporting mails to Europe have accepted the reduced rate of sea compensation fixed by the Berne treaty.

The cost of the transatlantic mail service for the year 1875 was less by $193,679.19 than the cost thereof for the year 1868, although the bulk of the mails transported in 1875 was double that transported in 1868.

At the rates now paid under the provisions of the treaty of Berne, there is a further reduction effected of 40 per cent. in the sea rates payable to the steamship lines.

* This decrease was in great part owing to the fact that under the new arrangement with Canada no account was taken of the number of letters exchanged with that country, or of the postages thereon, from January 1, 1875.

THE DIFFICULTY IN THE SOUTHERN STATES.

Now, it is far from my purpose to bring in any matter purely political; I am not going to do it. But the speech of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] this morning, which was and still was not upon this bill, leads me to say one thing in this connection in all fairness and candor. I have no hatred toward the people of the South; I have no hatred toward any man; I have no wrongs to be redressed. As the gentleman said, we are of the same country, the same people; and many of us upon this floor, although by residence and adoption of the North, are by birth of the South. But I want to submit one thing: you may sing psalms about the Centennial until the next Centennial comes; the gentleman from North Carolina may grow eloquent, and my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] may shed tears in return; that is all right. But that kind of thing will never knit the North and the South together. Action is the thing you want, not words; but action North and action South. Nothing will ever heal over the breach and restore complete good feeling but prosperity the country over.

Mr. ATKINS. How will you bring it about?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman interrupts me in the middle of a sentence. I was about saying that nothing will ever heal the breach and restore complete good feeling but that prosperity the country over, South as well as North, which will come and come only from the establishment of a genuine republican government in substance as well as in form in the hearts as well upon the lips of the people in the South as well as the North; that kind of love for the Republic that makes each citizen respect the rights of every other citizen, however humble he may be. And I will tell the gentleman how that genuine spirit of republicanism is to be brought about.

In my State of Illinois and elsewhere North there has always been two great parties seeking to control the policy of the Government. One watches and is a check upon the other. This was the case even during the late war; and as a general rule there is no interruption of personal, business, or social relations between the persons composing those parties. Many among the best friends I have in personal relations, men whom I esteem, are men who belong to the opposite political party; they would not vote for me nor I for them. And what you want to-day down South to restore prosperity is not pretty speeches, but you want that kind of public sentiment that tolerates those who disagree with you in politics, that kind of public sentiment that would cause the mass of intelligent people, the white people if you please, to divide into two political parties as we do in the North; and unless the intelligent white race South divide into two parties and quit proscribing those who differ with them in politics, how can you expect the less intelligent negro race to divide into two parties and learn the ways of self-government, or how can you expect the liberty-loving sons of toil, who make a State great and prosperous, to find homes in your territory, and add to its prosperity? Some one says we do tolerate numbers of different politics South. Straws show which way the wind blows.

I was pained to see how you do it by a remark which fell from the gentleman from Virginia when referring to his colleague from Virginia some days ago tauntingly, with a smile upon his face, but a sneer in his allusion; it was not "the gentleman from Virginia my colleague," but it was "the gentleman from Vermont." Now if you, being from Illinois, Mr. Chairman, (Mr. CAULFIELD in the chair,) born in Virginia as you were, had said, in referring to me, instead of "my colleague from Illinois," "the gentleman from North Carolina," forsooth because I happened to be born in North Carolina, it would not have been becoming on your part, and I will tell you to the extent of my ability I would "have gone for you;" and if I had referred to you as "the gentleman from Virginia" instead of as "my colleague from Illinois," you would "have gone for me;" and when we went home with that breach of good-feeling existing between us, our constituents would "have gone for both of us."

I beg pardon for having been led away from discussion of the bill. I did not intend it. Still I put it to you, gentlemen from the Southern States, whether in your great desire to make the South a unit in the next election and upon this floor with the democratic party of the North you can afford in the name of a sham economy to pass this bill as it comes from the Committee on Appropriations and thereby cripple the post-office service, that goes almost to the door of every man in the country.

So I say again, a little less centennial, if you please, and a little more statesmanship. Action is what is needed in the House and country.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman ought to direct his remarks to the distinguished gentleman from Indiana who reported this bill from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Ah, yes; the distinguished gentleman from Indiana reported the bill, but somehow or other the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, for whom I have great respect, both personally and for his ability, was born in democratic days, is a member of the democratic party, and always has been, (he is above the average, I admit;) but the party the gentleman belongs to since 1860 never learns anything, and will not die. [Laughter.]

And now then there is another matter I wish to speak of in this connection, and I hope gentlemen will give me their attention while I do it; because, if I am right, there is legislation proposed in this bill which is injurious to us in the West, to many in the East, and to all of you in the South. If you will follow the Appropriation Committee, you will not do it until after you have been challenged to investigate to see whether you should follow it or not.

I refer to the legislation there contained which proposes to pay railways by space instead of by weight for carrying the mails. I lay down this proposition, that it largely increases the pay of great trunk lines, and cripples almost 100 per cent. the weak lines, who only get $50 to $100 a year per mile for carrying mail matter. When I show you some figures, which are reliable, I trust you will go to work to look it up and see whether you are going to support that sort of thing or not.

Under the act of 1845 we paid to railroads for carrying the mails at the highest rate $375 a mile per annum. That continued up to 1873. There was then a grade of $100 per mile per annum, and still another of $50 a mile per annum. There were three rates, $375, $100, and $50. Of course the rates ranged all the way between $50 and $375, as the service might warrant. Up to 1873, the man who observed these things knows and understands the contention with the railroads was not about the law authorizing pay enough; O, no, but the strife was how they should be classed; where between $50 and $375 they should stand. It was not determined by weight. Under the operation and practice of the Department it was determined practically by the space in car taken for the service to be performed. Now, what did that bring about? A very strange state of affairs indeed. I hold in my hand the report of the Postmaster-General for 1867. He undertook to weigh the mails upon many of these roads. Mind you, this was under the space system alone. The mails were not weighed before that time. They had never been weighed from the time the service was put on up to 1867. Well, what does it show? It shows eight roads getting $275 a mile that carried from three to nine thousand pounds per mile. What else does it show? It shows fifteen roads that carried from three hundred and sixty-seven pounds to nineteen thousand pounds per mile per annum that were getting therefor $187 per mile, nearly $100 less, with twice the amount of mail. And so you can run over nearly all the railroads that were carrying the mail at that time from that table and find similar results. In tabular form the result of such weighing is as follows:

* Or 23,825 pounds, dividing the Pennsylvania Railroad at Harrisburgh.
† Or 3,794 pounds, dividing at Attica.

Well, they went to work to remedy this if they could. They weighed the mails. They re-adjusted the pay according to law, and it went on in that way, the railroads all fighting to get as near as possible to $375 a mile, but not a cent beyond, because the law forbade it, and the railroads, I believe, all carried the mails under that law up to 1873, at the time the law now in force was passed.

But in 1873 Congress passed a law, whoever may have brought it about, declaring they should be paid by weight, $50 a mile being probably the lowest, or about the lowest, and running up till some roads get nearly $1,000 a mile for carrying these mails, being paid for them by weight; whereas only two roads in 1867 were getting $375 a mile, and those were short roads, one of them running from Baltimore to New York. But the law was changed. They commenced weighing the mails, and the pay of the great trunk lines has greatly increased.

You know if you feed a horse good common fare he will go on and work pretty well; but when you give him an extra diet of oats he begins to kick up his heels. And so it is with these railroads; I mean the trunk lines. They did not make, comparatively speaking, many complaints under the old law. But the moment you raised the pay up to $300, $500, $700, $900 a mile these great railroad companies, having got a little too much oats, show their heels and begin to contend that they are not paid enough. They begin to give notice and to threaten they will throw off the mails. They were all to be thrown off a year or two ago. But, in my opinion, you could not hire them to throw them off even if you reduced the pay to one-half what it is. But they hope by constant agitation to create the belief that they are not paid sufficiently and thereby get this legislation through.

Many roads east and north as well as South and West under the present law get from $40 to $50, and from that to $100, a mile per annum for carrying the mails. Fifty dollars a mile per annum is little enough for a road carrying two hundred pounds of mail, and generally this class of roads run through sparsely-settled portions of country with much vacant space upon their passenger trains, and the wear and tear upon their machinery is as much as if they carried 5,000 pounds of mail, and space is not so much of an object as the making of the trip.

If, however, this bill should pass, eight feet in length, the width of a car, is enough space to carry, with ordinary mail service, from two to five hundred pounds of mail; at least so they tell me at the Post-Office Department. Now, 6 mills per foot for this space would cut the pay down to this class of roads nearly one-half. A road now getting $50 per mile per annum would get $30.04 per mile, so the already small compensation to this class of roads is cut off nearly one-half, where they are being operated with great difficulty and at enormous freight and passenger tariff to the people living along the line. I should not complain so much, however, if this was a saving to the Government and in the direction of true economy.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have very little time left.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I wish simply to ask the gentleman is he aware that the Post-Office Department recommended that change?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I do not care who recommended it. I am discussing the wisdom of the proposed legislation. We are responsible for the legislation if it is had; and I know some of the most competent men, of great intelligence and ability in the Department, do not believe that this legislation is wise. I have said that this bill would have the effect to cut down the small poor roads and benefit the great trunk lines. To show this, let me call your attention to the line leading from New York known as the New York Central and Hudson River and Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Raiload. This route has been long established, runs through a well-settled country, does a large business and a profitable one. The pay of this line for carrying the mails under the present law is $953,224.50 per annum; under this bill, using the same amount of space at 7 mills per foot, its pay would be increased $300,316.46, making its annual pay $1,253,440.96; whereas prior to 1873 $375 a mile was all that it could get, amounting to about $400,000 per annum. So this bill proposes to more than thrible the pay this line got in 1873.

The pay of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad from Baltimore to Grafton, 294 miles, now is $322 a mile per annum; at 7 mills per linear foot, as this bill provides, it would amount to $473.80 a mile. And its pay now from Grafton to Wheeling, 99 miles, is $282 per mile; at 7 mills per foot it would be increased to $311 per mile. The pay of the line from New York to Philadelphia, 90 miles, is $952 per mile; at 7 mills it would be increased to $1,186 a mile. And so I might go on, but my time forbids. I have said enough to show that the bill is not truly in the interests of economy. I think a better title for it would be "A bill making appropriations for service in the Post-Office Department and cutting down the small amount now paid small railroad companies under the present law, and giving the amount so saved to the great trunk lines that already get more pay for carrying the mails than is equitable."

The railroads contend, however, that they should have pay for the service actually performed in carrying the mails the same as they receive pay for any other service, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] thinks, as stated to the House during this debate, that on slow trains 6 mills per linear foot is about the commutation rate. Mr. Davis, adjuster of railroad pay in the Post-Office Department, and a man of great experience and ability, in a very thorough discussion of this whole question claims that the commutation rates to passengers who each take, say, one foot of the car linear measure for from 60 to 90 miles out of New York City on the Erie and other railroads is less than 4 mills per mile, getting his information from the Counting-House Monitor and personal knowledge and information. Now, if the railroad companies can afford to run passenger trains, drum up custom, and frequently not have their trains filled, and commute to passengers, making daily trips at less than 4 mills a mile, each passenger taking the equivalent of one foot linear measure the width of a car, certainly they can afford to let the Government have the service at the same rates, taking as it does the long hauls and paying for the whole space contracted for both ways. Yet this bill proposes to give 7 mills a mile per foot, nearly double the above commutation rates to individuals, and yet the gentleman say this bill is in the interest of economy. But grant for the sake of the argument that Mr. Davis is mistaken in his basis.

I still want to call attention that in all service except railway service the carrying of the mails is let by contract; and as it is not practicable to let the service to railways by contract and thereby get competition in carrying the same, the compensation of railways is fixed by general law, and it should be fixed as near as may be at what it would cost if it could be let by contract under the spur of fair competition. Now, then, the true rule is, I apprehend, the Post-Office Department should only be charged for mail service with the additional cost incurred on its account, and that the cost of the other services rendered should be estimated as if the postal car was not transported. To illustrate: Suppose an engine will haul a passenger-train of three cars and one baggage-car; it makes the run any way; and assume it has the capacity to haul a postal car in addition; the Government should only be charged the extra cost with a small profit of attaching the postal car to the train.

This principle operates as to the star and ocean service by virtue of competition, and why should it not operate as to railways when we fix the compensation by law? For example, the mail-route from Mesilla to San Diego, California, through New Mexico and Arizona, was let in 1870 for $200,000 per annum, and in 1874 for $100,000 per annum; yet there is more than three times the amount of mail matter passing over the route now than did in 1870, and no doubt the compensation of $100,000 now is a better bargain than $200,000 in 1870, for the reason that in 1870 there were serious Indian troubles, the route was new, and kept up at great expense to the contractor. Then the freight, express, and passenger business was much smaller in 1870 than in 1874, the population of Arizona having doubled within a year or two. I may state here that the contractor both in 1870 and 1874 carried passengers and express.

Again, in speaking of the transatlantic mail service, I have already shown the great decrease in cost of the steamship service since 1868. Prior to 1868 the Post-Office Department paid 55 cents an ounce to the steamers to carry the mails; in 1869 the pay was 20 cents an ounce; in 1872 the pay was 6 cents an ounce. When the price was decreased to 6 cents the Cunard and other lines refused to carry the mails, but by well-worked-up competition in less than three months they begged to be allowed to carry at that rate, and to-day the mail is being carried across the ocean at the rate of 3½ cents an ounce—quite a difference between 55 cents in 1868 and 3½ cents in 1876; and now these steamers race across the Atlantic that they may get the mails to carry at this price, the Department giving the mails to the steamers making the quickest trips. Apply this same principle to railways, and we would be inquiring how we could decrease the pay of these great trunk lines instead of making arguments to increase it. So the pay of railways should be determined not only by the space occupied, but the weight of mail carried, the country through which carried, the amount of other business done in connection with carrying the mail, as well as the extra expense of transporting the postal car on the passenger-trains—all should be taken into consideration. And as my time is nearly up, I want to say this kind of legislation should not be on an appropriation bill with so many other provisions to be kicked back and forth between the House and Senate in conference committee, and finally dragged through in the last hours of the session, the Lord only knows in what shape; on the contrary, it should come from some regular committee, in a bill by itself, provided always some committee can spare enough time from its duties of making investigations to perfect a bill, and should only be passed after full discussion and an intelligent understanding of the interests involved in the legislation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time is up.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I regret that my time has expired, as I am not yet through discussing this bill, and ask unanimous consent to add to what I have said such further remarks as I desire to make.

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, Hon. J. N. Davis, adjuster of railroad pay, a gentleman of great experience in that position for the last twenty years, has written an argument touching this question which sheds much light on the same, and he discusses the question with so much more ability than I can hope to do, that I feel I would be doing the House and country a service by so far making his discussion of this question a part of my remarks. What he says is as follows:

The controversy on this subject is not of recent origin. It is as old as the railroad-mail service itself, arising necessarily out of the peculiar character of that service. For conveying mails by every other mode, proposals have always been invited by public advertisement and contracts let to the lowest bidders; but, as there could be no competition for railroad-mail service and contracts therefor must be made, if at all, with the owners of the roads, Congress, from the first, in giving authority to the Postmaster-General to "cause the mail to be transported upon each and every railroad," coupled therewith the condition that he must "have it done upon reasonable terms."

The first act of Congress relating to the subject, approved July 7, 1838, (section 2,) authorized the Postmaster-General to cause the mail to be transported upon each and every railroad within the limits of the United States which then was or thereafter might be made and completed, provided he could have it done "upon reasonable terms, and not paying therefor in any instance more than 25 per cent. over and above what similar transportation would cost in post-coaches;" the second, approved January 25, 1839, (section 1,) forbade the Postmaster-General to allow more than $300 per mile per annum to any railroad company for the conveyance of one or more daily mails; and the third, approved March 3, 1845, (section 19,) directed him to arrange and divide the railroad routes into three classes, according to the size of the mails, the speed with which they were conveyed, and the importance of the service, and to pay not more per mile per annum than $300 for the first, $100 for the second, and $50 for the third class, provided that, if one-half the service on any road were required to be performed in the night season, 25 per cent. might be added to these maximum rates.

The leading consideration prescribed in the act last cited (the act of 1845) as the ground for determining the classification of railroad routes, namely, "the size of the mails," evidently had reference to their productiveness as sources of revenue, or, in other words, of the means necessary to defray the expense involved, thus following a principle observable in the legislation respecting the postal service of the country, and governing the practice of the Department more largely than any other consideration, that the cost of the service should bear some due proportion to its productiveness.

Until a comparatively recent period, the differences between the Post-Office Department and many of the railroad companies had respect entirely to the classification of their roads under the law, the companies claiming for them a higher classification than that to which the Department deemed them entitled. In the discussion of these differences embarrassments arose from the want of accurate knowledge of the facts according to which the law required the classification of the routes to be determined, of which the leading one, as already remarked, was "the size of the mails." To obviate this embarrassment, the Department, in the year 1867, addressed circulars to the proprietors of all the railroad routes in the country, requesting them to weigh the mails they conveyed on their routes respectively for thirty consecutive working days and forward to the Department statements showing the weights of the mails, the dimensions, fixtures, and furniture of the car or apartment provided for mails and agents, and the frequency with which the mails were conveyed. The returns made in answer to this call revealed the fact that great inequalities existed between the amounts of service performed by different companies receiving equal rates of compensation. Thus on those routes which received $300 per mile per annum, the average weight of mails per day conveyed the whole length of the routes respectively ranged from 22,581 pounds to 7,668 pounds; on those which received $200, from 19,183 to 367 pounds; on those which received $150, from 7,384 to 287 pounds; on those which received $100, from 7,086 to 71 pounds; on those which received $75, from 2,048 to 40 pounds; and on those which received $50, from 6,488 to 12 pounds. The full returns received from the railroad companies were published in tabular form in the Postmaster-General's Annual Report for 1867 (pages 72–88) and were elaborately noticed in the text of the report, (pages 10–13,) the Postmaster-General closing his remarks thereon as follows:

Not the weight of the mails alone, it is true, but also the accommodations provided for the mails and agents of the Department, the dimensions, fixtures, and furniture of the car or apartment allotted to their use, the frequency of the service, and, it may be, other circumstances besides, are entitled to consideration in adjusting the pay for railroad transportation. Still, "the size of the mails" being, in the main, undeniably the principal indication or test of "the importance of the service," the figures above cited display great inequalities in the rates actually allowed. No general systematic revision and re-adjustment of these rates, based upon the returns received, has yet been attempted, but in a number of cases of disagreement between the Department and railroad companies the returns have been used as a guide to a proper settlement of the dispute; and as the terms of existing contracts expire, and it becomes necessary to enter into new engagements, it is expected that such changes will from time to time be made as will eventuate, ultimately, in the nearest practicable approach to a perfect classification of railroad routes and graduation of their pay according to the comparative value and importance of the service they perform.

In pursuance of the purpose thus intimated, changes have been made, based wholly on returns similar to those first obtained in 1867, whereby within the six years ending September 30, 1873, a net increase of the rates of pay for railroad mail service has been allowed amounting to an average of $201,500.33 per annum—the aggregate increase for the six years being $1,209,001.98.

In proof that until recently the controversy between the Department and the railroad companies related to the classification of the roads, and not to a want of power under the law to award proper compensation for the highest class of service, the fact may be cited that as late as the 30th June, 1868, there were in all the country only three routes (composing the line, 190 miles in length, between Baltimore and New York) which received the maximum rate allowable under the law, $375 per mile per annum; only one route, 76 miles long, which received $325 per mile; only six routes, having an aggregate length of 560 miles, which received $300 per mile; and only thirty routes, having an aggregate length of 5,019 miles, which received rates ranging between $300 and $200 per mile, including the latter; while of routes receiving rates lower than $200 there were four hundred and sixty-three, having an aggregate length of 30,173 miles. The aggregate length of all the railroad routes on the 30th June, 1868, was 36,018 miles, and the aggregate cost of transportation thereon $4,177,126 per annum. On the 30th June, 1873, the aggregate length was 63,457 miles, and the aggregate cost $7,257,196 per annum; an increase in five years of 27,439 miles in length, and $3,080,070 in annual cost.

The earliest contracts made with the Department for the transportation of mails on railroad routes contained stipulations, variously expressed, to the effect that the mails should be conveyed in "cars," or in "a post-office car," or in "a separate car or apartment in a car," "fitted up, under the direction of the Post-Office Department, for the exclusive accommodation of the mails and of the agents," or "agent of the Department," who should be "transported" or "conveyed without further charge." These contracts were drawn up sometimes wholly in manuscript and sometimes on printed forms prepared for post-coach service, with interlineations adapting them to the altered circumstances of the case. In the first form printed expressly for railroad service the stipulation reads:

Second. To carry said mail in a safe and secure manner, free from wet or other injury, in a separate car, or apartment in a car, to be fitted up, under order of the Department, if the Postmaster-General shall require one, for the exclusive accommodation of the mail and the mail agent, who is to be conveyed without any further charge.

In practice, as a general rule, at least since 1st July, 1851, one or more route-agents have been appointed to accompany, receive, and distribute the mails on each railroad route, and an apartment has been provided and fitted up by the company for their use, varying in size, say, from one-eighth to one-half the length of a baggage or passenger car. So that the distribution of mails while in transit on railroad routes is not new, though the system has been extended within a few years past to matter passing over successive links in long mail lines instead of being confined as before to mails passing between points less widely separated, with no local distributing post-office intervening.

To extend the system in this manner, the Department in the year 1864 notified the proprietors of railroad routes composing several of the principal mail lines of the country that more car room would be necessary than they had previously provided. It has been repeatedly alleged of late that such companies were induced to provide the required additional room by promises yet unfulfilled of increased compensation. Thus, in the communication addressed to the Postmaster-General by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and others, under date of the 27th January, 1873, in which the Department is notified that only on condition of their receiving the rate of forty cents per eight-wheel car per mile run (afterward changed to thirteen mills per linear foot per mile run) and two cents per mile for the transportation of post-office agents riding in passenger cars, with immunity from damages for accidents to post-office clerks riding free of charge, would those companies consent to provide and run railway post-office cars on or after the 1st day of April then next ensuing, and that, failing to obtain said terms, they would "be prepared then and thenceforth to transport the mails in the mode which obtained before they were induced by the General Post-Office Department to provide railroad post-office cars," it is alleged that "many years since" the companies introduced such cars upon their several roads "under assurance from the Post-Office Department that they should be paid for their services," and "that they have never been paid for the use of said cars." And in the testimony given by the president of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad Company before the Senate Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, at their session in New York in April, 1873, it is stated that "in 1864 the railroad companies between New York, Philadelphia, and Washington were induced to place postal cars upon their roads by verbal assurances of the Post-Office Department that the postal act of 1845 should be so revised and amended as to allow reasonable compensation for mail service," and that "every year since their introduction we [the companies] have applied in vain for payment for the use of these postal cars."

The facts, however, are as follows: In the first place, the Department, when, in the year 1864, it notified the railroad companies that more car room than they had previously provided was necessary, asked no more, in any case, than "a separate car," which the contract stipulation above quoted already entitled it to demand. And then, when the companies claimed that on the ground of the fulfillment of that stipulation they would be entitled to additional compensation, the Department replied that the desired cars were necessary to expedite the mails; that the Postmaster-General was anxious to reform and improve the whole system of distributing both letters and newspapers to avoid delays, too often occurring under the then existing system; that the benefits resulting from the contemplated changes would soon be widely felt, and it was believed that the railroad lines which afforded the necessary facilities would attract the special attention of the traveling public; that with these views the Postmaster-General could not allow a special consideration for the desired cars; that he would pay a reasonable rate for transporting mails, and claimed to prescribe how the service should be performed; that there were existing agreements with the companies, and, if the existing pay was not satisfactory to them, the reasons should be presented and they would be duly considered; but that it could not be allowed that the furnishing improved mail cars was a just reason for demanding new terms. These views of the Postmaster-General were presented in a letter to the postmaster at Philadelphia, under date of the 26th July, 1864, acknowledging the receipt of correspondence between the postmaster and the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, "concerning cars for traveling post-office," and closing with an expression of the hope that he might "succeed in procuring them unconditionally, leaving the question of increased compensation to be determined without regard to the traveling post-office." Letters of similar tenor were addressed, under the same and subsequent dates, to Thomas Clark, superintendent of mails in the post-office at New York, who was conferring with the proprietors of the Erie Railway on the subject, and to Special Agent G. B. Armstrong, at Chicago, who had reported that he was "getting matters arranged for the new service," and who was informed, in reply, that the Postmaster-General would "not listen to the question of additional compensation in connection with the construction of the cars for railway post-offices," and that "that must be brought up separately."

The records of the Department contain many other letters addressed, as these were, to persons acting under its instructions in making arrangements for the initiation of the extended system of distributing mails while in transit, but they contain no "assurances" beyond the general intimation of the willingness of the Department to consider any reasons which might be presented to show why the existing compensation was not satisfactory, and to "pay a reasonable rate for transporting mails," "without regard to the traveling post-offices," as it could not be allowed that the furnishing improved mail cars was a just reason for demanding new terms. How, in the face of these oft-expressed views and determinations of the Department, in writing, in letters addressed to agents employed in procuring from the railroad companies the desired improved accommodations, any "verbal assurances" at variance with these views could have been offered by the Department or its agents, or accepted by the companies as an "inducement" to provide and run railway post-office cars, it is difficult, if not impossible, to conceive. On the part of the railroad companies, however, the cars were actually provided and run, and on the part of the Department the re-adjustment of the compensation for transporting mails on railroad routes, according to the amount and character of the services they severally performed, including railway post-office cars and all the rest, was faithfully and laboriously made, commencing with the weighing of the mails in 1867, as above noted, and continuing, with the results herein particularly set forth, correcting the "great inequalities" found to exist at the date of the weighing, by awarding additional compensation to roads before inadequately paid, amounting at the end of six years to the net sum of $1,209,001.98, after deducting the amount taken for the same period from the annual compensation of roads previously overpaid. Meantime the Postmaster-General repeatedly, in his annual reports, beginning with that of 1869, asked Congress to consider the propriety of revising and re-adjusting railroad compensation so as to establish rates just and equitable to all concerned. And Congress, by act approved March 3, 1873, authorized a further re-adjustment, which is now in progress, whereby the railroad companies will probably receive for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, a million and a half of dollars in excess of the amount paid them for the preceding year. It cannot be admitted, therefore, that the Department ever offered to the railroad companies any "assurances" to "induce" them to provide and run railway post-office cars, which it has not abundantly fulfilled.

The act of March 3, 1873, provides for the re-adjustment of the compensation for the transportation of mails on railroad routes on a mixed basis, consisting partly of the amount of mail matter conveyed and partly of the amount of space provided, in the form of railway post-office cars for the distribution of the mails. To a large majority of the railroad companies the re-adjustment of their pay on this basis appears to be perfectly satisfactory. A few, however, complain that while it affords ample and even excessive compensation to roads carrying large amounts of mail matter and furnishing comparatively small amounts of space it affords rates disproportionately low to roads on which these circumstances are reversed.

It cannot be denied that there is some force in the complaint thus made. An example will illustrate this: On a route carrying over its whole length an average weight of mails per day of 39,000 pounds, and providing railway post-office cars, each fifty feet long, sufficient to perform two daily trips each way, the rate of pay allowable under the act is $705 per mile per annum—$625 for the amount of mail matter and $80 for the railway post-office cars. This is the state of facts existing on the Erie Railway, and this rate of pay has been allowed from July 1, 1873. On a route carrying 17,240 pounds, and running two daily lines of railway post-office cars fifty feet long, the rate of pay allowable under the act is $433 per mile per annum—$353 for the amount of mail matter and $80 for the railway post-office cars. A provision in the act, applicable to all railroad routes, both those which do and those which do not run railway post-office cars, requires that "sufficient and suitable room, fixtures, and furniture, in a car or apartment properly lighted and warmed, shall be provided for route agents to accompany and distribute the mails." In practice, this provision is deemed to be complied with when the required room is furnished for the accommodation of a line of route-agents running each way once a day, and accommodations for additional lines are deemed to warrant additional compensation. On the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad the average weight of mails per day is 17,248 pounds, two daily lines of railway post-office cars fifty feet long are run, and route-agents' accommodations in excess of a daily line each way are furnished. On this state of facts, allowing for the excess of route-agents' accommodations $7, for railway post-office cars $80, and for the amount of mail matter $353, the pay of the company, from July 1, 1873, is rated at $440 per mile per annum. Thus, of these two routes, furnishing each an equal amount of space in the form of railway post-office cars, one receives $705 and the other $440, a difference of $265 per mile per annum, despite the fact that the one receiving the lower rate furnishes a greater amount of space than the other for the accommodation of route-agents, the difference in the rate of compensation in favor of the former being attributable to the greater amount or weight of the mails it conveys.

The proprietors of a comparatively small number of roads which, like the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore, furnish a large amount of car space compared with the amount of mail matter they convey contend that the appropriate remedy for the apparent discrimination against their own and in favor of the other class of roads would be to fix the compensation solely according to the space provided, leaving the amount of mail matter entirely out of view. The Department, on the other hand, having regard to the principle recognized as before remarked in the legislation on the subject and which has uniformly governed its own practice, namely, that the cost of mail service should bear some due proportion to its productiveness, cannot assent to an abandonment of the idea of a mixed basis for the determination of the rate of pay. And if a rule were adopted to fix the compensation solely according to the amount of space provided, without regard to the amount of mail matter conveyed, or, consequently, to the productiveness of the service, the outcry would only be transferred from the few roads which complain of the injurious operation of the present rule to the much larger number which would be injured by the change, including many of the most important and productive routes.

A solution of the difficulty may perhaps be found in such a modification of the mixed basis as will give to the element of space a greater, and to that of weight a less, influence than they now have, respectively, in determining the rates of compensation. The act allows $200 per mile per annum for an average weight of mails of 5,000 pounds per day, and $25 additional for every additional 2,000 pounds per day, the companies being required in every case to convey the mails with due frequency and speed, and to provide sufficient and suitable room, fixtures, and furniture in a car or apartment properly lighted and warmed for route agents to accompany and distribute the mails; and the act allows additional pay per mile per annum for every line comprising a daily trip each way of railway post-office cars at the rate of $25 for cars 40 feet in length, $30 for 45-foot cars, $40 for 50-foot cars, and $50 for 55 to 60 foot cars. Let these conditions be modified as follows: when the average weight of mails per day shall exceed 15,000 pounds, let the additional allowance for the first 9,000 pounds of the excess be at the rate of $25 for every 3,000, instead of every 2,000 pounds, and when the average weight per day shall exceed 24,000 pounds, let the additional allowance for the excess be at the rate of $25 for every 4,000 pounds. Let the amount of car space to be provided be fixed according to a given scale, so much for each of the several rates of pay per mile per annum, say 64 square feet once a day each way for $50, 32 square feet for the first addition of $25, and 24 square feet additional for every succeeding addition of $25, until the pay shall have reached $325 per mile per annum, and 32 square feet additional for every $25 in excess of $325. Let this space be used at the discretion of the Department, the company providing the necessary fixtures, furniture, light, and heat, either for railway post-office service, for route-agent service, or simply in the form of room on trains not accompanied by railway post-office clerks or route agents. For any excess of car space over the amount fixed for a given rate of pay let an additional allowance be made at the rate of $1.25 for every 8 square feet, equivalent to 15⅝ cents per square foot.

The following statement will show the effect of such a modification of the law upon the pay of the two roads mentioned in the foregoing example: The amount of car space required on the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad, according to the proposed scale, would be 358 square feet once a day each way. The amount provided by the company, as shown in their latest report, for railway post-office and route-agent service is equivalent to 1,239 square feet once a day each way. Allowing, say, 54 square feet for room (of which no report has yet been made) on trains carrying mails not accompanied by clerks or agents, making in all 1,293 square feet once a day each way, the excess over the required amount would be 935 square feet. The pay per mile per annum for the weight of mails, 17,248 pounds per day, being, according to the proposed modification of the scale of weights, $343, and the allowance for the excess of car space, say 935 square feet, at 15⅝ cents per square foot, $146, the whole pay would be $489 per mile per annum—$49 more than the present rate. The amount of car space required on the Erie Railway, according to the proposed scale, would be 552 square feet once a day each way. The amount provided by the company, as shown in the latest report, for railway post-office and route-agent service is equivalent to 994 square feet once a day each way. Allowing, say, 38 square feet for room on trains carrying mails not accompanied by clerks or agents, making in all 1,032 square feet once a day each way, the excess over the required amount would be 480 square feet. The pay per mile per annum for the weight of mails, 39,170 pounds per day, being, according to the proposed modification of the scale of weights, $494, and the allowance for the excess of car space, say 480 square feet, at 15⅝ cents per square foot, $75, the whole pay would be $569 per mile per annum—$136 less than the present rate. This would diminish the difference between the rates of pay per mile per annum allowed the two roads from $265, its present amount, to $80, which would be a very small allowance for the difference in the weights of the mails, considering, as it is absolutely necessary to do, the difference which this fact makes in the amounts of the postal revenues which the two lines produce.

The pay of the Erie Railway, thus modified, would be $6.50 per mile per annum more, and that of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore only $73.50 per mile per annum less than the utmost amount allowable under the act of June 8, 1872, which authorized an addition of 50 per cent. to the previous maximum of $375, (increasing that maximum to $562.50,) on such roads only as furnished railway post-office cars; and that act was repealed by the act of March 3, 1873, because it involved too large an expenditure of money (probably not less than a million and a half of dollars) for the exclusive benefit of a comparatively small number of roads, having an aggregate length of only 14,866 miles against a remainder of 48,591 miles left unprovided for.

It remains to be considered whether the rates modified as above proposed would afford due compensation for the transportation of mails on railroad routes.

A statement was made up in the Department in April, 1873, comparing the mail pay under the acts of 1845 and 1873 with the charge for first-class freight between New York and Chicago under the tariffs of the Blue Line, the International Line, and the Empire Line, by which it appeared that for the amount of car space per annum in use for mail service on the line via Philadelphia and Pittsburgh the companies would receive, at the rate paid for first-class freight, allowing 10,000 pounds to a thirty-foot car, the sum of $221,290.48, whereas their pay for mail service on the same line under the act of 1845 was $307,350, an excess of $86,059.52; that for the amount of car space per annum estimated to be necessary in case of making certain proposed improvements the companies would receive, at the first-class-freight rate, $316,788.09, whereas their mail pay under the act of 1873 would be $411,813, an excess of $95,024.91; that at the rate demanded by the companies, thirteen mills per linear foot of car space per mile run, their mail pay for the amount of car space in use at the date of the statement would be $625,388.48, against $221,290.48 of freight charge for the same amount of space, an excess of $404,097.96; and that for the amount required for the proposed improvements their mail pay at the rate demanded would be $895,273.04, an excess of $578,484.95, or more than 182 per cent. over and above the freight charge for the same amount of space. To this statement Mr. Kneass, of the Pennsylvania Railroad, made a reply in which he claimed that the load of a thirty-foot car was underestimated at 10,000 pounds, his company carrying 18,000 pounds on a twenty-six foot car. And Mr. David A. Wells, in a paper written, as it appears, at the request of the president of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad Company "and other representative railroad managers," referring to the same point and also to the reply of Mr. Kneass, claimed "the minimum load" to be "from 16,000 to 18,000 pounds," and that 16,000 pounds was "the lowest general average weight of freight carried by a freight car" thirty feet in length. Projecting the comparison on this altered basis, both these gentlemen arrive at results very different from those presented in the statement to which they reply. But, on a slight examination, their answer appears very vague and unsatisfactory.

The statement made up in the Department referred not to freight generally, but specifically to "first-class freight," of which, as it consisted mainly, according to the tariffs of the "fast-freight lines" used in the comparison, of articles of light weight compared with their bulk, it was deemed fair to assume that an average load for an eight-wheel car thirty feet long would not exceed ten thousand pounds. The reply, on the other hand, affords not a particle of information as to what constitutes an average load of first-class freight, but gives generally and vaguely "the lowest general average weight of freight carried by a freight car." It adheres, however, to the first-class rate in comparing the freight earnings with the mail pay, and so arrives, not at an actual result, but at what would be the result if the average load of first-class freight were equal to the "general average weight of freight carried by a freight car," which its authors forbear to claim to be the fact in the case. They thus evade instead of answering the argument. The rate per hundred pounds for first-class freight from New York to Chicago, as shown in the tariffs referred to, was $125. The same tariffs showed the other rates to be: for second-class freight, $1.10; third-class, 85 cents; fourth-class, 65 cents; and special, 50 cents. Taking the percentage of the several classes of freight actually transported to be the same as they appear by Poor's Manual to have been, according to the nearest practicable computation in the year 1871, namely, nine of the first, five of the second, eighteen of the third, nine of the fourth, and fifty-nine of special, the "general average" rate per hundred pounds would be 67.4 cents. At this rate the "general average weight of freight carried by a freight car," if it be 18,000 pounds, as Mr. Kneass asserts, would yield the companies $121.32; if 16,000 pounds, as Mr. Wells asserts, $107.84. Of these sums the latter is $17.16, and the former $3.68, less than the $125 which the companies would earn by transporting the 10,000 pounds assumed in the statement to be a fair average load of first-class freight for a thirty-foot car at $1.25 per hundred pounds. And this, let it be particularly observed, is in the absence of any deduction from freight earnings on account of hauling freight cars empty in either direction, whereas it is apparent from the most accurate attainable information that from one-fifth to one-third of the aggregate movement of freight cars consists of hauling them empty. So far, therefore, the statement made up in the Department, as an argument to prove that the mail pay per car per mile run exceeds the charges for through freight on the line in question, whether the calculation be made on the basis of the first-class rate for a load of 10,000 pounds or of the "general average" rate for a load of 16,000 or 18,000 pounds, stands unrefuted.

Mr. Wells says, however, that a comparison of postal-car service with first-class-freight service is "opposed to all reason and justice, inasmuch as it has already been shown that first or second class freight is never carried in connection with passenger or express trains, while postal cars are never connected or move with freight trains." But the railroad men themselves set the example of instituting the comparison complained of. The Pennsylvania and other railroad companies uniting in the notification of January 27, 1873, before referred to, complain of "receiving for their mail service a rate per car per mile smaller than their ordinary third-class-freight rate for common freight cars on slow freight trains," and say that the rate they claim "is less than that paid by the public for the transportation of car-loads of freight in cheap cars at low speed." The president of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad, in his testimony before the Senate Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, at New York, in April, 1873, said the pay of his company for mail service under the act of 1845 was "only 65 per cent." of their "tariff rate for transporting pig-iron;" and when asked by Senator Casserly of the committee what would be the result of the terms demanded for the mail service, he replied that second-class freight gave his company a little over forty cents a car a mile; and, referring to his own and the other companies demanding this rate, he said, "We fixed a very low rate; and when we speak of forty cents as being second-class we meant to keep entirely within bounds." Many similar asseverations from railroad men might be cited; but these may suffice.

Waiving, however, any claim that the mail pay is adequate on the ground that it is equal or more than equal to the average freight earnings per car per mile on railroad routes, a comparison more just and reasonable may perhaps be made with the charges for transporting passengers on fast express and passenger trains.

In instituting such a comparison, it is proper to remark that the postal service is in many respects peculiar, and that its special characteristics, distinguishing it from other classes of service performed on railroad routes, entitle it to distinct and special consideration. Senator MITCHELL, from the subcommittee of the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, in his report (No. 478) to the Senate on this subject, submitted on the 23d of June, 1874, makes the following just observations:

> The postal service is one in which the people of the country are generally interested. Perhaps no other public service touches so many private interests. The efficient and economical administration of the Post-Office establishment is probably more beneficial to the owners of railroads than to any other class of citizens.

In this view of the subject, the postal service should certainly receive from the owners of railroads at least as fair treatment as they accord to any other branch of their business. No other branch is more certain, continuous, and regular. For no other can the amount and character of the preparation necessary or the amount of compensation be more reliably determined upon in advance. For passenger transportation large accommodations are regularly provided, in the utter absence of any assurance that they will be fully occupied by travelers. Every passenger pays only his single fare, whether he be the sole occupant of a car capable of seating fifty or occupy it in company with nine, nineteen, or forty-nine others. What amount of compensation the owners will receive for the service is therefore altogether uncertain. On this account the rate exacted from every passenger who happens to occupy a seat is such as would yield enormous profits if every seat were constantly filled. This is evident from the vast disparity between the rates demanded for this uncertain passenger transportation and those which the companies ask from passengers whom they engage to carry daily to and fro throughout the year.

On the Erie Railway, for example, as appears from the annual report of the state engineer and surveyor of the State of New York for 1873, page 508, the rate of fare for first-class through passengers was 2½ cents, or 22 mills per mile, and for first-class way passengers 2⅝ cents, a fraction over 27 mills per mile; while, as the Counting-House Monitor shows, the commutation rates for passengers whom the company engaged to carry daily to and fro throughout the year were, for a distance of 10 miles from New York City, a little over 9½ (9.584) mills per mile; for a distance of 48 miles, a little under 4 (3.918) mills per mile; and for a distance of 88 miles, a little over 3⅓ (3.267) mills per mile, the rate decreasing in every instance as the distance increased. Comparing the regular rate of fare for passengers traveling the greatest distance, that is, for through passengers, with the commutation rate for the greatest distance, the former, being 22 mills, is 6.73 times as great as the latter, which is 3.267 mills, (22÷3.267=6.73+.) These two rates are deemed to be the fairest for comparison. But the lowest commutation rate on the Erie is not as low as that of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad, on which annual tickets between Philadelphia and Baltimore, a distance of 98 miles, for a year commencing on the 1st of January, as it is ascertained by inquiry from an officer of the company, are sold for $200, which is at the rate of 3.260 mills per mile; and the average rate for a less average distance on several other roads mentioned in the Monitor is still less, the rate being for 88 miles on the New Jersey Midland 2.904 mills; for 73 miles on the New York, New Haven and Hartford 3.194 mills; for 62 miles on the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western 3.220 mills; for 59 miles on the Long Island 2.978 mills; for 54 miles on the South Side 3.254 mills; and for 40 miles on the New Jersey 3.394 mills—an average rate for the whole of 3.126 mills per mile for an average distance of 66⅔ miles.

Senator MITCHELL, in his report before referred to, page 21, estimates the actual average cost of transporting each linear foot of a passenger-car at 5 mills per mile run. The average seating capacity of a passenger-car being about one passenger to each linear foot, the cost of transporting a linear foot of car would be the cost of transporting a passenger. Putting this at the Senator's estimate, 5 mills per mile, the companies conveying commuters at the Erie rate, 3.267 mills, would lose 1.733 mills per mile on each passenger, or, conveying them at the average rate on the other six roads, 3.126 mills, would lose 1.874 mills per mile on each passenger. With fifty passengers in a fifty-foot car, and a cost of 25 cents (250 mills) per mile for transporting the car, the companies receiving at the Erie rate 16.335 cents, or at the other 15.630 cents, would lose in the one case 8.665 cents, or in the other 9.370 cents per car per mile. Supposing any portion of the car space unoccupied, (as is the case with about two-thirds the average amount provided,) the loss would be greater, as the receipts would be less, without diminishing the cost.

It is inconceivable, of course, that the railroad companies should voluntarily establish rates for passenger transportation which would result in actual and inevitable loss to themselves. Their commutation rates must be a source of profit, not of loss, despite any appearance to the contrary which might arise from averaging the cost and earnings of their whole passenger business. The additional expense incurred for the transportation of commuters must be less than the average expense of the whole passenger business.

The practicability of increasing the length of a train at an increase of cost less than the average cost of the whole train is strikingly illustrated in a recent publication, in a passage respecting the additional cost occasioned by adding sleeping-cars to passenger trains. Albert Fink, chief engineer, vice-president, and general superintendent of the Louisville and Nashville and Great Southern Railroad, in a pamphlet published at Louisville in 1874, entitled "An investigation into the cost of transportation on American railroads," estimates the average cost of carrying one ton of gross weight on passenger trains over the main stem of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad in 1873 at 1.27 cents per mile run. (Page 20.) Then, (page 22,) stating the tons of gross weight transported one mile in sleeping-cars on passenger trains for the year at 12,281,608, he sets down the cost of transporting sleeping-cars, at the average rate, at $155,946.72. Further on, however, (page 27,) he says:

Passenger trains, unlike freight trains, (and we refer here to "through" freight trains,) are on many roads not loaded to the full power of the locomotive. The cost of hauling one or more additional cars on a train, until the power of the locomotive is fully utilized, will be less than the average cost per car prior to such increase, and the average cost of the gross ton hauled will also be lessened. If therefore the estimate of the cost of the sleeping-car service is based upon the average cost per gross ton, as in the preceding computations, (both for simplicity and to illustrate the effects of an increased load,) it will show a reduction in the cost of the other services rendered as compared with the cost prior to the use of the sleeping-car. The sleeping-car service would therefore be overcharged to the extent of this reduction; and the other parties using the passenger trains, if charged in accordance with cost, would become the beneficiaries to the same extent. Hence it appears that the sleeping-car service should only be charged with the additional cost incurred on its account, and that the cost of the other services rendered should be estimated as before the introduction of their cars.

He then (pages 27–29) estimates the total additional cost of hauling the sleeping-cars, assuming that it was not necessary to increase the power of the locomotive on that account, at $39,604.21 for the year, instead of the $155,946.72, found on the basis of the average cost of $1.27 per gross ton per mile, whereby he shows that the sleeping-car service was overcharged, on the basis of the average cost, to the extent of $116,342.51, the actual cost being to the average cost as 1 to 3.93, (155,946.72÷39,604.21=3.93+.) Thus, by Mr. Fink's showing, the sleeping-car service, on the basis of the average cost of passenger business, would be charged with 3.93 times the expense it actually occasioned to the company. This suggests the method of solving the problem how the Erie and the other companies above named obtain profits from the performance of passenger transportation at commutation rates which are so far below the average cost to them of their passenger business. If the actual cost of this particular service is to the average cost of their passenger business as 1 to 3.93, then that average cost, which, by Senator MITCHELL'S estimate, is five mills per linear foot or per passenger per mile, must be divided by 3.93 to find the actual cost of this particular service, which would therefore be 1.272 mills per linear foot or per passenger per mile, (5÷3.93=1.272+.) On this basis the Erie's profit at the 3.267 mills commutation rate would be 1.995 mills per passenger per mile and that of the other six companies at the 3.126 mills rate would be 1.854 mills per passenger per mile.

The mail service being, in at least an equal degree with the sleeping-car and commutation-passenger services, a mere incident or adjunct to the general business of the railroad companies, the addition of the mail service to their other buiness cannot be supposed to increase their expenses in any greater proportion than does the addition of these other services. The difference between the actual cost occasioned by the additional service and the average cost incurred in its absence which Mr. Fink shows to exist in the case of the sleeping-car service, and which appears by inevitable inference from the facts above set forth to exist with reference to the transportation of commuters, must exist in equal if not greater force in the case of the mail service. If, then, the rates established by the companies, of their own voluntary, unconstrained motion, for the transportation of commuters be paid by the Government for the mail service, the companies certainly cannot justly complain. The payment to them of 3.267 mills or 3.126 mills for a service which costs them only 1.272 mills, yielding a profit in the one case of 1.995 mills, over 156 per cent., or in the other of 1.854 mills, over 145 per cent., must be admitted to afford them adequate remuneration, to say the very least.

This conclusion is widely at variance with that at which Senator MITCHELL arrives. He, assuming that the cost of the mail service to the companies is 5 mills per linear foot of car space per mile run, which he estimates to be the average cost of their passenger transportation, and claiming for them a profit of 3 mills per linear foot per mile, concludes (page 29) as follows:

From all the facts which have thus far come to the knowledge of your committee, it is their opinion that 8 mills per linear foot of car per mile run—equal to 24 cents per thirty-foot car per mile run—will afford ample remuneration for the post-office car service.

But if the actual additional cost to the companies occasioned by adding the mail service to their general business be only 1.272 mills, instead of five mills per linear foot of car per mile, the payment of 8 mills for that amount of service would afford much more than "ample remuneration;" it would yield a profit of more than 528 per cent.

The post-office car service performed on the Erie Railway between New York and Middletown, a distance of 66 miles, including the route-agents' apartments run once a day each way between those points, is equivalent to 80,128 linear feet per mile per annum, and on the remaining 393 miles, on which a double daily line of railway post-office cars alone are run, it is equivalent to 62,600 linear feet per mile per annum. For this amount of car service the company would be entitled at the rate charged commuters, namely, 3.267 mills per mile, to $261.78 per mile per annum between New York and Middletown, and to $204.51 per mile per annum on the residue of the route. The Department pays the company under the act of March 3, 1873, the uniform rate of $705 per mile per annum, making no separate allowance for the route-agents' apartments. This is, therefore, between New York and Middletown $443.22 per mile per annum, and on the residue of the route $500.47 per mile per annum, more than the company could possibly earn by an equal amount of car space devoted to the transportation of passengers at the commutation rate of 3.267 mills per passenger per mile. The actual compensation received by the company for mail service under the act of March 3, 1873, is $323,595 per annum for 459 miles. Their passenger earnings from an equal amount of car space, at their commutation rate of 3.267 mills per passenger per mile, would be $97,650 per annum, $225,945 per annum less than their annual mail pay. Their annual passenger earnings at their commutation rate would average $212.74 per mile, $492.26 less than their average mail pay per mile per annum. To pay then the rate which would result from the proposed modification of the law, namely $569 per mile per annum, would afford them an excess of $307.22 per mile per annum between New York and Middletown, and of $364.49 per mile per annum on the residue of the route, over their utmost possible earnings at the commutation rate. This is on a route where the average weight of mails exceeds 39,000 pounds per day, which is the case on only one other route in the country, namely, the section of the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railway between Elyria and Millbury.

The post-office car service on the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad, including the route-agents' apartments, is equivalent in feet per mile per annum to 127,896 on 14¼ miles, 97,848 on 13½ miles, and 82,824 on the remaining 72 miles. For this amount of car service the company would receive, at the Erie's commutation rate of 3.267 mills per mile, a compensation per mile per annum of $417.83 on 14¼ miles, $319.67 on 13½ miles, and $270.58 on the remaining 72 miles. At their own commutation rate of 3.260 mills per mile, the company would receive a compensation per mile per annum of $416.94 on 14¼ miles, $318.98 on 13½ miles, and $270 on the remaining 72 miles. The Department pays the company, under the act of March 3, 1873, the rate of $440 per mile per annum, which includes $7 per mile per annum for extra route-agent service. This is on 14¼ miles $22.17, on 13½ miles $120.33, and on the remaining 72 miles $169.42 per mile per annum more than the company would receive for an equal amount of car space devoted to the transportation of passengers at the commutation rate of 3.267 mills per passenger per mile, and $23.06 on 14¼ miles, $121.02 on 13½ miles, and $170 on the remaining 72 miles, more than they would receive at their own commutation rate of 3.260 mills per passenger per mile. The actual compensation received by the company for mail service under the act of March 3, 1873, is $44,000 per annum for 100 miles. Their passenger earnings from an equal amount of car space at the commutation rate of 3.267 mills per passenger per mile would be $29,856 per annum, $14,144 per annum less than their annual mail pay; and their passenger earnings at their own commutation rate of 3.260 mills would be $29,791.86 per annum, $14,208.14 per annum less than their annual mail pay. Their annual passenger earnings at the Erie's commutation rate would average $298.56 per mile, $141.44 less than their average mail pay per mile per annum; and their annual passenger earnings at their own commutation rate would average $297.92 per mile, $142.08 less than their average mail pay per mile per annum. To pay them the rate which would result from the proposed modification of the law, namely, $489 per mile per annum, would afford them an excess of $71.17 per mile per annum on 14¼ miles, of $169.67 per mile per annum on 13½ miles, and of $218.42 per mile per annum on the remaining 72 miles, over their utmost possible earnings at the Erie's commutation rate of 3.267 mills, or of $72.06 per mile per annum on 14¼ miles, of $170.02 per mile per annum on 13½ miles, and of $219 per mile per annum on the remaining 72 miles, over their utmost possible earnings at their own commutation rate of 3.260 mills. The amount of car space provided for the mail service on this route and the weight of mails on the other being exceptionally large, the sufficiency of the mail pay allowable either under the existing law or under the proposed modification thereof to afford to either class of roads profits equal to those which they derive from the use of an equal amount of car space for the conveyance of passengers at commutation rates, and leave a large margin for contingencies besides, may without violence be assumed to be conclusively established.

The rates which the proposed modification of the law would allow for the amounts of car space required as the complement to the given weights of mails (supposing an average of eight feet for the width of the car and allowing three hundred and thirteen working days to the year) would be nearly 10 mills per linear foot per mile run for the first 12 linear feet once a day each way, a fraction over 13 mills for every linear foot in excess of 12 until the space should amount to 42 linear feet, and nearly 10 mills for every linear foot in excess of 42. These rates would be based upon the carriage of the required weight of mails and the provision of the required complement of space. The allowance for space alone, in excess of the amount required as the complement to the weight, would be only about 2 mills per linear foot per mile run. Yet the rates resulting from such a mixed basis appear, even in the extreme case of excess over the required complement of space furnished by the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad Company, above set forth, to afford a much larger compensation than the company could possibly earn by using an equal amount of space for the conveyance of passengers at commutation rates.

Senator MITCHELL proceeds (page 29) to say:

While it appears that many railroad companies now receive ample remuneration for the mail service, it is certain that there are other companies which are inadequately paid. The present method of payment is faulty. A new method should be devised, based upon space, speed, and frequency of service. To this all agree.

It may be admitted that "the present method of payment is faulty." The examples above given sufficiently illustrate this. Some modification ought, therefore, to be adopted. But it is far from being clear that the substitution of the uniform rate of 8 mills per linear foot of car per mile run would produce results satisfactory to a majority of the railroad companies. To those who provide a very large amount of car space compared with the weight of mails they convey it would doubtless be very pleasing. A few examples will show the effect on the pay of such companies.

The Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad Company now receive for their service between Baltimore and Philadelphia the rate of $440 per mile per annum, making their annual pay for 100 miles $44,000. At the rate of 8 mills per linear foot of car per mile run, allowing nothing for space on trains carrying mails not accompanied by railway post-office clerks or route agents, their pay per mile per annum on 14½ miles would be $1,023.16, on 13½ miles $782.78, and on the remaining 72 miles $662.59, and their annual pay for the whole 100 miles would be $73,110.14, an excess of $29,110.14 over their present pay, or an increase of 66 per cent. The same company receive for their service between Wilmington and Delmar the rate of $115 per mile per annum, making their annual pay for 96.92 miles $11,145.80. At the rate of 8 mills per linear foot of car per mile, (the company furnishing 24 linear feet of car space twice a day each way for route-agent apartments,) their pay would be $248.38 per mile per annum, making their annual pay for 96.92 miles $24,073.37, an excess of $12,927.57 over their present pay, or an increase of 115 per cent.

The proprietors of the connecting route, the Eastern Shore Railroad Company, receive for their service between Delmar and Crisfield the rate of $65 per mile per annum, making their annual pay for 38 miles $2,470. At the rate of 8 mills per linear foot of car per mile, (28 linear feet of space once a day each way being furnished,) their pay would be $140.22 per mile per annum, making their annual pay for 38 miles $5,328.51, an excess of $2,858.51 over their present pay, or an increase of 115 per cent.

On the Portland and Kennebeck Railroad, between Augusta and Fairfield, with 841 pounds of mail a day, two lines of 42-foot railway post-office cars a day each way, and 16 feet for route-agent apartment once a day each way, the present pay is $140 per mile. At 8 mills per linear foot it would be $500.80 per mile.

On the Maine Central, between Fairfield and Bangor, with 3,625 pounds of mail a day and the same car space as between Augusta and Fairfield, the present pay is $225 per mile. At 8 mills per linear foot it would be $500.80 per mile.

On the Portland, Saco and Portsmouth, between Portland and Portsmouth, with 7,683 pounds of mail a day, one line of 40 feet railway post-office cars a day each way, and a half line of 22 feet route-agent apartments one way a day, the present pay is $283 per mile; at 8 mills per linear foot it would be $455.72 per mile.

On the Eastern, between Boston and Portsmouth, with 8,669 pounds of mail a day, and the same car space as between Portland and Portsmouth, the present pay is $295 per mile; at 8 mills per linear foot it would be $455.72 per mile.

On the Baltimore and Ohio, between Washington and Grafton, 254 miles, with 11,403 pounds of mail a day, and two lines of 52½ feet cars, the present pay is $360 per mile; at 8 mills per linear foot it would be $524.17 per mile.

On the same road, between Grafton and Wheeling, 99 miles, with the same weight of mails, one line of 52½ feet cars, and 17 linear feet of space a day each way for route agents, the present pay is $320 per mile; at 8 mills per linear foot it would be $346.38 per mile.

On the Richmond, Fredericksburgh and Potomac, between Washington and Richmond, with 6,180 pounds of mail a day, two lines of 43 feet cars each week day and one on Sunday, the present pay is $265 per mile; at 8 mills per linear foot it would be $466.46 per mile.

On the Chicago and Northwestern, between Chicago and Milwaukee, with 3,263 pounds of mail and two lines of 42½ feet cars, the present pay is $220 per mile; at 8 mills per linear foot it would be $425.68 per mile.

It would be easy to make such changes as these. The railroad companies benefited thereby would not be likely to make the least objection. Most of these companies appear, however, to be perfectly satisfied with their present compensation.

But by far the larger number of changes which would result from the adoption of the rate of 8 mills per linear foot of car per mile would be in the opposite direction; the pay would be reduced. The following are a few examples: Between Bangor and New Brunswick the pay per mile per annum would be reduced from $175 to $90.14; between Farmington and Brunswick, from $75 to $60.09; between West Concord and Hyde Park, from $125 to $75.12; between Burlington and Rouse's Point, from $185 to $122.69 on 24½ miles, and from $170 to $96.60 on 31 miles; between White River Junction and Derby Line, from $175 to $115.18; between Windsor and Burlington, from $193 to $122.69 on 93 miles, and from $178 to $95.15 on 26 miles; between Saint Albans and Richford, from $75 to $47.57; between Richford and Newport, from $100 to $67.18; between Ticonderoga and Leicester Junction, from $100 to $70.11; between Concord and Nashua, from $225 to $159.50; between Concord and Wells River, from $125 to $85.13; between Concord and White River Junction, from $190 to $111.63; between Boston and Fitchburgh, from $220 to $75.12; between Ayer and Mason Village, from $62.50 to $30.04; between New Bedford and West Wareham, from $50 to $25.87; between Fitchburgh and Bellows Falls, from $160 to $120.19; between Boston and Nashua, from $205 to $110.17; between Worcester and Nashua, from $107 to $61.76; between Fitchburgh and Hoosac Tunnel, from $170 to $150.24 on 69 miles, and from $160 to $75.12 on 18 miles; between Palmer and Miller's Falls, from $100 to $57.16; between Palmer and Winchendon, from $50 to $39.22; between Boston and South Berwick Junction, from $172 to $130.20; between New London and Palmer, from $120 to $57.17.

These examples are cited at random from the New England States. They might be multiplied indefinitely from other sections. Changes in this direction—downward—it would be difficult, perhaps impossible, to accomplish. The many companies whose interests would be injuriously affected thereby would make most earnest and persistent opposition; and, in the end, it is almost certain the dispute would be settled by the companies furnishing sufficient additional space to warrant the continuance of their present rates of pay, and then the net result of the adoption of the eight-mills rule would be a large increase of the aggregate expense of conveying mails on railroad routes, already amounting annually to more than $9,000,000.

Another effect of adopting a uniform rate of 8 mills per linear foot of car per mile would be to reverse the inequality now complained of between the pay of roads which, like the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore, provide a large amount of space and carry a comparatively small amount of mail, and those which, like the Erie, carry a large amount of mail and provide a comparatively small amount of space. Thus, the pay per mile per annum of the first-named road, which carries 17,248 pounds of mail per day, would be, as above shown, on 14½ miles $1,023.16, on 13½ miles $782.78, and on the remaining 72 miles $662.59; equivalent to $731.10 per mile of its whole length; while that of the Erie, which carries 39,170 pounds of mail a day, 127 per cent. more than the other, would be on 66 miles $641, and on the remaining 393 miles, $500.80; equivalent to $520.96 per mile of its whole length, a difference of $210.14 per mile in favor of the road carrying by far the smaller mail, and consequently earning for the Government by far the smaller revenue. The pay of the Boston and Albany, between Boston and Springfield, carrying 37,742 pounds of mail a day, would be $609.30 per mile, $121.80 less than that of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore. The pay of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad between Washington and Grafton, carrying only 11,403 pounds of mail a day, would be $524.17 per mile, $3.21 more than the average pay of the Erie, carrying nearly three and a half times as much mail. Many other instances might be cited.

In all the practice of the Department, whenever an increase of mail service has been asked for involving increased expense, inquiry has been made whether the postal revenue from the line interested was sufficient to justify the expense. The adoption of space as the basis for fixing the rate of compensation for railroad-mail service, irrespective of the weight of the mails, would be an abandonment of this rule and of the principle in the legislation on the subject, heretofore referred to, from which the rule arose. And should it become the practice to disregard the weight of the mails as a ground for the allowance of pay, rates fixed for large amounts of space would be likely in many cases to be continued when altered circumstances, which would be apt to escape the notice of the Department, might render a less amount of space sufficient.

If any uniform rate per foot of car per mile were adopted, irrespective of the contents of the car, the compensation which would accrue to the companies would be very different from their receipts for passenger-car service. These depend, not upon the number of linear feet, but upon the contents—the number of passengers to a car. If the passengers are many, the earnings are large; if few, the earnings are small. Each one of fifty passengers in a fifty-foot car would be expected to pay his single fare; but no one happening to ride alone in such a car would be required to pay fifty fares. The rates per linear foot of car per mile received by the proprietors of different lines for passenger transportation differ very widely, as the comparative amounts of occupied and unoccupied car space vary; and it would be impossible for the proprietors of any road to enforce the payment of rates which would make a given amount of car space yield a fixed amount of revenue, whether occupied or unoccupied by passengers. This principle cannot be discarded in arranging the rates to be paid for the transportation of the mails. For space amply occupied with mail matter, from which an ample revenue arises, a much larger rate of compensation may be allowed than for space which, like the passenger cars on many roads, is nearly vacant. A mail line yielding large postal returns to the Government will, on this principle, afford large compensation to the parties performing the transportation, and a line yielding smaller returns to the Government will afford smaller compensation to the transporters. These results will be precisely like those which arise from running passenger cars through different sections of the country, some more and others less densely populated. The companies should not expect more from the mail service than from passenger transportation in this respect.

Senator MITCHELL suggests that "a new method should be devised, based upon space, speed, and frequency." The subject of space having been considered, it may be remarked that extraordinary speed might, under some circumstances, be made the basis of an additional allowance of pay. In the case, for instance, of establishing a mail line between New York and Chicago, as Mr. Bangs, the general superintendent of railway-mail service, has suggested, the trip to be made in twenty-four hours, requiring a speed of forty miles or more an hour, an increase of 35 or 40 per cent. on the ordinary rates might be allowed. Supposing the weight of mails which such a fast line would convey to be 60,000 pounds per day, the pay for weight, with the required complement of space, say 90 linear feet once a day each way, would be $625 per mile. The additional car space necessary, say 110 linear feet at $1.25 per foot, would add $137.50, making $762.50; and 35 per cent. ($266.87) added to this would make the whole pay $1,029.37 per mile per annum. A line like this, run expressly for mail purposes, might with propriety be allowed such an increase, on account of the extraordinary speed required and the consequent increase of expense to the companies, incurred, not for their own ordinary business purposes, yielding a merely incidental advantage to the mail service, but expressly for the benefit of the mail service. This fact would make the case exceptional, the ordinary mail service being, as already remarked, a mere incident or adjunct to the general business of the roads, and occasioning in most instances but little, and in some scarcely any, additional expense.

Differences in speed arising from the local circumstances of different roads, and necessary for their own business purposes, could hardly be deemed a proper ground for any considerable discrimination in the rates of pay for mail service. The three main lines between New York and Chicago for example, the one via the Pennsylvania Railroad and its connections, 913 miles in length; another, via the Erie and Lake Shore Railroads, 961 miles in length; and the third, via the New York Central and Lake Shore Railroads, 984 miles in length, must, to make the run in equal time, use different rates of speed. The longer lines, using necessarily the greater speed, could hardly claim higher pay for mail service on that account. It would be preferable, all other things being equal, to send the principal mails by the line having the fewest miles to be paid for. And in ordinary cases such differences in speed as are found to exist have scarcely any appreciable effect upon the value of the service to the Department.

For the "frequency of service" the proposed modification of the mixed basis would allow compensation to be made by counting as a part of the required complement of space the room occupied by mails not accompanied by route agents, as well as the apartments or cars provided for route agents or railway post-office clerks.

The difficulty of framing any general law to operate equally upon all the parties interested in this matter is freely acknowledged. But, all things considered, the maintenance of a mixed basis, modified as above proposed, appears preferable to the adoption of any method which would wholly exclude the amount of mail matter from consideration as a ground for determining the rates of pay. The mixed basis has hitherto been used, and the complaints made against it have been far fewer than would be likely to arise from the adoption of a space basis. The principal objections to the present method are the excessive inequality it causes between the pay of roads circumstanced as are the Erie and the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore and the excessive cost of service on roads carrying very heavy mails. These the proposed modification of the mixed basis would obviate, without producing the inequalities in the other direction which would result from the adoption of a space basis, irrespective of the weight of mails.

Appended hereto is a schedule of rates for railroad-mail service under the proposed modification of the act of March 3, 1873, showing the average weight of mails, whole distance per day, the square feet of car space required, the linear feet, (dividing the square feet by 8, the supposed average width of the car,) and the pay per annum per mile of the route's length in each case, with the allowance for space in excess of the required amount. In comparing this allowance with the rates fixed in the present law for railway post-office cars, the fact that it is only for the excess over the required amount must be considered in order to arrive at its practical effect in any given case. A road, for instance, carrying 7,000 pounds of mail per day and providing 640 square feet, say 80 linear feet, of railway post-office car room, the required complement of space being 240 square feet, say 30 linear feet, would be allowed only for the excess over 240 square or 30 linear feet. The present allowance for weight being $225 per mile, and for 80 linear feet of railway post-office car space $50 per mile, the whole pay would be $275 per mile. By the modified scale, the allowance for weight would be the same as at present, $225, and for the 400 square or 50 linear feet excess of car space $62.50, making the whole pay $287.50 per mile per annum. This slight increase in cases of this class would be far overbalanced by the decrease in cases in which the weight would bear a greater and the space a less proportion to each other. A road, for instance, carrying 40,000 pounds of mail a day and providing 960 square or 120 linear feet of car space, the required complement of space being 560 square or 70 linear feet, would receive by the modified scale $500 per mile for weight and $62.50 for the 400 square or 50 linear feet excess of car space, making the whole pay $562.50 per mile per annum, against $717.50 under the present law, of which $637.50 would be for weight and $80 per 100 linear feet of railway post-office car space, supposing 20 linear feet to be used for route-agent apartments, for which the present law allows no extra pay. The effect of the adoption of the proposed modification of the law would therefore be to diminish the aggregate cost of railroad mail service, which is a "consummation devoutly to be wished."

Mr. DUNNELL obtained the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that the committee reporting this bill will be allowed a few moments to explain the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not aware that the gentleman from Indiana desired the floor.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to make a single statement, to which I desire to call his attention?

Mr. HOLMAN. The question the gentleman has to settle is with the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] who is entitled to the floor, with whom he is differing as to the merits of the bill and its effect.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, the post-office appropriation bill comes nearer home to a larger number of our constituents than any other bill that we are called upon to pass. Were it not for some items contained in the one under consideration, I should not ask, for a single moment, the attention of the committee. The Post-Office Department makes itself felt in every household, and there are counties where the Federal Government is only known through the humble postmaster of the towns. It is a Department for which we should legislate wisely and liberally. I am satisfied that the people expect that kind of legislation in regard to it. The American people are intelligent; they are readers; they are writers of letters; they are in communication through the mails with each other all over the country. The Post-Office Department, therefore, is popular; it is all the time near at hand and making itself felt among the people.

I admit that, at the present time, the public sentiment demands reform and retrenchment; it demands the cutting off of all unnecessary public expenditures. Yet it is not reform to reduce the expenditures of a Department below what is justified by the figures, upon any general plan or theory of retrenchment and reform. I have before me statistics which show very conclusively that for the years that have passed, the Post-Office Department has been as economically administered and probably more so, than any other branch of the public service. There are also statistics which show that the increase in the expenditures of this Department is far below the increase in all the elements that make expenditures necessary. Those statistics, when justly considered and looked at from no partisan stand-point, are indeed a source of a great deal of national pride and congratulation.

We are a growing people—growing in strength, in wealth, and in population, and constantly augmenting our resources. It cannot be expected that a Department, well-equipped for the increased demands of the whole country, can now be run as cheaply as it could have been eight or ten years ago. It is a branch that must necessarily cost more and more every year during all the years that are to come. Beyond a certain limit its expenditures cannot be lessened, but rather they will increase as the number of the post-offices is increased, as mail-routes are extended, and as railroads are multiplied.

There is no party in power or out of power that can ever bring these expenditures below their present limit. There is no party that can ever come into power that will ever have a less footing than we are able to show at the present time. An increase of the expenditures of that Department is inevitable. We should look at that fact in order to legislate wisely and well in regard to its real wants.

Now look a moment at these statistics, and what do we discover? Between 1868 and 1875 there was an increase of the money-order business of 178 per cent.; in the number of money-orders, 585 per cent.; in the aggregate amount of money-orders issued, 390 per cent.; in the amount of fees and commissions on money-orders, 343 per cent.; and in the number of money-orders paid, 496 per cent. These percentages indicate the increase and growth of the business of the Department during these years.

Take the total expenditure of the Post-Office Department in 1868, and we find it to be, in round numbers, $22,000,000, while in 1875 it was $33,000,000; an increase of expenditures of but 47 per cent. The percentage of increase of expenditures was lower than any other percentage that enters into the table showing the work and the growth of the Department. It cannot be said in reply that that increase results from extravagance; it is an inevitable result.

If we go through the entire list, we shall find that the Department has increased very largely in all its demands upon the Treasury for money. I have no desire to discuss this question except from a purely practical stand-point. I have no partisan word to utter in what I may say upon this occasion. I will come directly to the bill. I will here, however, insert some statistics giving the increase in the business of this Department, sustaining the positions which I have already taken.

A statement showing percentage of increase in the following items of the postal service for the years 1868 and 1875.

I desire the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who has charge of this bill, to state, when he comes to speak upon some of the items in it, how he expects to reduce the expenditures of the Post-Office Department below the amount that we appropriated last year. Last year there was appropriated for mail depredations and special agents the sum of $160,000, while this bill appropriates but $110,000. That is a very large reduction in that branch of the force of this Department. Now the Postmaster-General tells us and the country that he cannot possibly run his Department with a less special force than he is now allowed. He has, moreover, stated to many gentlemen in private conversation that if the Government business in his charge was his own private business, he would double this expenditure as a mere matter of economy and of good management on his part. The expenditure of $33,000,000 a year calls for a careful and efficient supervision. While possibly the present law ought to be amended so that these agents may have a fixed and certain compensation, yet the amount placed by this bill at the command of the Postmaster-General is too small to meet the demands of the service.

As I wish to dwell somewhat extendedly upon what is here termed "inland transportation," I shall not dwell much more upon these minor items, for I have agreed to yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

The compensation to railway post-office clerks is reduced from $1,257,141 to $1,125,000, notwithstanding the constantly increasing length of railway mail service. That for route agents has been reduced from $1,050,000 to $945,000. In like ratio there has been a reduction in the item for mail-route messengers, for local agents, and for mail-messengers. It cannot be charged that these subordinate mail offices are now overpaid.

I will come to the item on the third page of this bill, "for inland transportation $14,500,000." The gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. WALDRON,] a member of the Committee on Appropriations, has so well met this point, that I hardly feel called upon to repeat the arguments which he used.

Examine that item, observe the amount appropriated, and ascertain the amount that it cost last year, and there will stare you in the face the bold fact that this year the Department will be called upon to carry on what is known as the star service, the service outside of railroads and steamboats, for nearly $3,000,000 less than it has expended for the last year in carrying it on. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has called attention to this fact. There was expended last year, or will be expended by the end of June next, not much less than $6,000,000 for this star service. Now, if we take out of the $14,500,000 given by this bill for inland transportation the amount that the railroad service will cost, which the Second Assistant Postmaster-General assured me this morning will be $10,108,225.56, and add the amount to be paid for steamboat service at the same rate of this year, there will be left but $3,707,644.44 with which to carry on the star-service department.

I call attention to the following statement in the last report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, the cost of inland-mail transportation was as follows, to wit:

On 871 railroad routes, aggregating 70,083 miles in length	$9,216,518 00
On 89 steamboat routes, aggregating 15,788 miles in length	684,130 00
On 7,232 other routes, designated "star-routes," aggregating 192,002 miles in length	5,453,721 00
Total cost during last fiscal year	15,353,369 00

Which was an increase of 8,776 miles in the length of routes over the preceding year, and a decrease of $48,688 in the cost thereof.

The appropriation to cover the expenditure for inland transportation during the present fiscal year is $17,548,000, and the same sum is estimated for the next year.

At the commencement of the present fiscal year, I adopted a plan of book-keeping in this Office by which the cost of the mail-service in operation at the close of each month can be ascertained. The reports for the first three months of the year are now before me, and from them I obtain the data for estimating the probable necessary expenditures of the next year.

The cost of mail-routes in operation July 1, 1875, (the commencement of the present fiscal year,) was	$14,949,660 13
To which has been added an increase for July, August, and September of $189,793.61, which, being considered an average increase for the several quarters of the year, would make the increase during the entire year	759,174 44
Add to this the recognized service of railroads, (which is explained below,) estimated at	762,489 79
Making probable cost of inland transportation for present year	16,471,333 36

The above calculation is as reliable as any that can be made concerning the cost of a service during nine months yet to come. It is sufficiently accurate to enable me to say that no extraordinary expenditures will likely be necessary which can swell the annual cost of this service more than $200,000 above the sum exhibited in the above estimates. Therefore, without resorting to the calculation by per cent. of increase heretofore relied on in this Office as a guide in estimating future expenditures, I think it safe to say that an appropriation for the next year equal to that provided for this year will be sufficient.

I am here as a Representative from a frontier State. I am here to represent those who are thus interested in the mail service. What is the result already foreshadowed by the report of this bill? There are applications in the Post-Office Department to-day for the establishment of three hundred new post-offices. Members of Congress are told that no new post-offices can be established. There are petitions on file calling for more service in this and that portion of the country. The Postmaster-General tells us there can be no increase of mail service with the appropriation reported in this bill, and which we fear may pass; that post-routes must in many instances be abandoned, and the postal service reduced. In one county of my district where four hundred votes are cast, there is but one mail line, and I am unable to secure any increase. The Department replies, "We are unable to give you any additional service, for we foresee our inability to sustain what we have."

We are here, Mr. Chairman, as the Representatives of the people. We are not here representing the destinies of a party nor the Department. We are to legislate for the highest weal of the people of the country. They demand a liberal mail service. Recall the excitement of the public mind last year because of the provision which was put upon one of the appropriation bills increasing the amount to be paid upon third-class mail matter. The people everywhere were indignant at that legislation; they have everywhere demanded its repeal, and they expect this Congress will not adjourn until the law on that subject is restored. The people demand a post-office service that is liberal, that reaches every portion of the Republic.

Mr. Chairman, there are those who talk about the service on the frontier. They complain that that service costs too largely. I say people who are to be struck down by this bill. It is not Connecticut, it is not Massachusetts, it is not the older and more thickly-settled States. It is the sparsely-settled portions of the country that are to to Representatives from the West and from the South that we are the be injuriously affected by this bill. I trust that there will be little of party when we come to vote on this inland-transportation item. I trust that gentlemen on the other side will say "Away with party, when we come to a bill that so certainly touches every family in the districts that we represent."

It is not true that the Western States draw more heavily than the East upon the Post-Office Department. I have here a few statistics relating to the States of Maine, Connecticut, and Minnesota. I suppose that if the census were taken to-day in those three States it would show a population not varying more that ten thousand. The census of each of those States would be about 610,000. The population of Minnesota in 1870 was 439,000; it is now 610,000. We have three Representatives on this floor; Connecticut has four; Maine five. Now, let us look at the post-office statistics for the last year as relating to these States. The receipts of the Post-Office Department in Maine were $423,000, in Connecticut $583,000, and in Minnesota $325,000. Now, let us look at the expenditures. The total expenditure in Maine was $556,417.49; in Connecticut, $556,061.37; Minnesota, $464,174.41. Thus it will be seen that nearly $100,000 less were given to Minnesota to carry on the postal service in that State than to the State of Maine. What is the respective territory of these States? In Minnesota we have 83,000 square miles; Maine contains 31,766 square miles. It is not, then, to be charged to the Western States that it is more burdensome to the Government than the Eastern States. The State of Connecticut contains but 4,674 square miles; Minnesota, with equal population, and about seventeen times as large; yet in Connecticut the expenditures of the Post-Office Department were $556,000, while in Minnesota they were but $464,000.

The service in the older States has long been fixed. It is on the frontier and in the Territories where the struggle arises to get from time to time the increase which the rapidly increasing population and business call for. We are unable to get the service that we need. Mr. Chairman, I hold that the pioneer, whether he goes toward the west or toward the south, is that citizen of the Republic who should not be neglected in legislation. Now I respectfully submit that this bill will affect the West and the South by a failure to secure the proper amount of mail facilities. I trust that this will be remembered, and that we shall secure an increase in this amount for inland transportation. It is proposed to cut down the amount hitherto expended for the star service from about $7,000,000 to near $4,000,000, or from 38 to 40 per cent. Not a dollar less will be expended for steamboat service or for railroad service; all this reduction must come from the star service, and it is this that so disastrously affects the more sparsely settled portions of the country. It affects the settlers on the frontier, it affects those who are a little removed from railroad communication. A citizen, a few miles from a railroad, loyal to his government, industrious, fulfilling his part as a citizen, should have the same facilities we give to him who is differently located. At any rate, as far as possible, let us make equal the mail facilities furnished the people.

A word more. I have perhaps sufficiently shown by statistics within my reach that it is an error to suppose the remote States are more expensive to the Post-Office Department than other States. There are but six States in the Union where the receipts are equal to the expenditures, and those are Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. Taking this list it will there be discovered that these very States in the South and West to be most affected by this reduction are the States which relatively cost less to the Government and where the receipts are relatively larger. The receipts as I have shown in Maine were $423,000; while in Minnesota they were $325,000, but the expenditures in Minnesota were less than in Maine by a large percentage. Consequently we are not to be told that our postal service is made expensive because of the frontier. Many of the older States to-day are more expensive to the Department, considering the number of population, than many of the newer States.

But, as I said a few moments ago, we in the West are compelled to ask for increase of service. The service in the older and thickly settled portions of the country has been fixed for many years. Service in the newer portions is less fixed. Where there is a lack of means in the Department these are sure to suffer reduction. This bill foretells an inevitable reduction in mail facilities.

I have expected, Mr. Chairman, that the dominant party in this House would make retrenchment. It would be unjust to them not to presume they would, but I very respectfully say that this is not the Department in which to make these extraordinarily large reductions. If there are extravagances in the Post-Office Department, cut them off, but deny to no county, deny to no portion of the country the amount of mail service they have hitherto enjoyed. The people do not expect it, and they will not sustain a policy that cripples that branch of the public service which so greatly contributes to their own intelligence, and so directly affects their business interests.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, there is no Department of the Government associated so intimately with the business interests, social relations, and general well-being of the people of the United States as the Post-Office Department. It was termed by a former Postmaster-General one of the agencies for the civilization and education of the people of the United States. The expression was not too strong. While I favor a reduction of the expenditures of the Government wherever it can be properly done without embarrassing the administration of the Government, I shall go for it; but wherever it is proposed to reduce the expenditures so as to embarrass the administration of the Government or injuriously affect the interest and well-being of the people, I will not go for it.

Premising this, I propose now to send to the Clerk's desk to be read two amendments, which I shall ask to be acted on when we come to consider the bill by sections for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 1 of the bill by striking out after the word "transportation," in line 53, "$14,500,000," and inserting in lieu thereof "$16,000,000;" so it will read: "for inland transportation, $16,000,000."

Amend section 7 by inserting after the word "hour," in line 10, the words "not more than;" after the word "miles," in line 14, the words "not more than;" and at the end of line 21 "nor more than $450 per mile of road per annum;" so it will read:

SEC. 7. That railroad companies furnishing cars or parts of cars for the exclusive accommodation of the United States mails and the agents in charge of said mails, for what is known as postal-car, route-agent, or baggage-car service shall be paid at the following uniform rates, to wit: When by an order of the Postmaster-General the mail-car is attached to trains or space set apart for through or express mails on trains run regularly during any quarter on a schedule time, between terminal points, at a rate of speed not exceeding twenty-five miles per hour, not more than six mills per linear foot of interior full-width car-space per mile run; attached to or set apart on trains run regularly during any quarter on a schedule time, between terminal points, at a rate of speed exceeding twenty-five miles, not more than seven mills per linear foot of interior full-width car-space per mile run: Provided, That no railroad company transporting the United States mail shall, when all the requirements of the Postmaster-General under the laws governing the transportation of the mail by railroad are complied with, be paid a less rate than $25 per mile of road per annum nor more than $450 per mile of road per annum.

Mr. REAGAN. Before I take my seat I will occupy a few minutes of the time allotted to me in explaining those amendments.

Under the estimates of the Postmaster-General, it will require $10,500,000 to pay for the postal-railway service; that is, for transportation of mails by railway. The bill of the committee proposes to appropriate for the purpose of transporting the mails $14,500,000. This will leave $4,000,000 for the transportation of the mails in this Union in States and Territories outside of the transportation by railroad. It requires no argument to show that if the $10,500,000 shall be spent in carrying the mails by the railroads, little over $4,000,000 is entirely inadequate to keeping up the mail service of the United States outside of railroad transportation.

What, then, is to be the effect of the adoption of the bill in the form in which it now is? It is, as I shall show, to give the most extraordinary rates of mail pay to the railroads ever given under any law in this Union and to deprive that portion of the people not dependent on the railroads for their mails of the ordinary mail facilities to which they have been accustomed and which are so necessary for their convenience, for their business, and for their well-being.

When I state this proposition I state that which it seems to me will so far command attention as to induce the members upon this floor to consider whether it is the deliberate purpose of this House to so cripple the mail service that the people cannot be supplied with mail facilities by the Post-Office Department. I wish to say further that, as was stated by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] and perhaps by one or two other gentlemen, this loss of mail service will fall upon the Western States, upon the Territories, and upon the Southern States, where there is a less dense population than in the Middle and the Eastern States. I know, sir, that it has sometimes been said that the people ought to pay for their own mail facilities, and that in the Territories and in some of the most sparsely-settled States the postal revenues are not equal to the expenditures of the Government in extending to them mail facilities. That is true, sir; but it has never been the policy of this Government from its foundation, from the establishment of the Post-Office Department till this day, to require that each portion of the territory of the Union or that each mail-route in the Union should furnish the revenues necessary to pay the expenses on it. And there are wise and proper reasons for this.

Why, sir, what is it that makes the business of our great cities? It is their business connections with the country. And if the people of the Territories are to be deprived of all mail facilities over what the revenues from their Territories supply or if the people of the sparsely-settled States are to be deprived of all mail facilities over what their revenues supply, you interrupt and impede the correspondence and the business relations between the great business centers of the country and those portions, far distant from them perhaps, of the country with which they have their business and their social relations. It is a system to be operated altogether. It is to benefit all parts of the country. You may say that a small post-office in the interior of the country somewhere only yields $100 of revenue; but while it is yielding that, it is the place to which the correspondence, in letters, in circulars, and the newspapers, the books, the packages from business centers go, they paying at those business centers the postage on those things that go to these country post-offices. I desire that to be remembered in thinking of this; that it is not merely the postage collected at the offices in the interior portions of the country that they are to be credited with, but they ought to be credited with the revenues which arise from the correspondence of other portions of the country with them; and when you do this you reach a sensible and an equitable way of viewing that subject.

But, sir, my judgment is that under this bill it will be much worse for the people than it is thought to be under the estimates of the Postmaster-General. My own judgment is that if the bill in its present form is adopted, not only ten millions but much over ten millions of the $14,500,000 appropriated for mail facilities will go to pay for the transportation of the mails upon the railroads. I desire to call attention to a few facts just here that I beg this House will think of before they act upon this bill. By the act of March 3, 1845, the Postmaster-General was required to classify the railroad mail service. The maximum rate to be paid the railroads under that law was $300 a mile. If, however, half the service was performed in the night he might add 25 per cent.; so that up to 1873 the highest amount that could be paid to any railroad was $375 a mile. For reasons which perhaps are susceptible of explanation in some measure, that I do not propose to give now but may attempt to give at a future day, in 1873 a new mode of ascertaining the mail pay due to railroads for their services was adopted. By the act of the 3d of March, 1873, it was provided that the railroads should be paid at so much a pound for the mail matter carried, the mails being weighed on each route a given number of days to ascertain the average amount of mail matter and to determine the amount of mail pay. What was the effect of that? It was at one bound to make the cost of the railroad service increase more than $1,600,000; as shown by the report of the Postmaster-General more than $1,600,000 was added to the cost of the railroad mail service by that act, which the Congress was then asked to believe was an act not only of justice but of reform and retrenchment.

I will call attention directly to some particular cases illustrating the effect of the provisions of that law. The injustice of raising mail pay to from $500 to $700 a mile, when no one believes that any such price is demanded by equity, was so gross and the country so revolted at it that it was found necessary to escape the odium of this law; and now we are offered one which it is said, I understand, is to reduce the expenses of the railroad postal service $2,000,000 a year. I wish to call your attention to figures to show you that the present bill is another increase of the cost of the railway postal service under another assumption of reform and retrenchment. I do not ask you to take the bare statement which I make, but I ask you to take the figures, and I will give you some of them so that you will see that I am not mistaken in assuming that the present bill, while purporting to be a bill of reduction of expenses, will add to the enormous amount unnecessarily paid to railroads beyond what they earn, and at the expense of postal facilities to more than one-half of the people of this country. I do not say at the entire expense of mail facilities, but to the great injury of the postal facilities of this country.

Now, sir, I desire to call your attention to particular facts to illustrate what I have been saying. Take the railroad line from the city of New York to Chicago, first by the Erie road to Dunkirk, and from that by the Michigan Southern to Chicago, and take the road by the way of Albany and Buffalo to Dunkirk and along the same route to Chicago, with two short parallel lines.

Now these routes, which carry the mails between New York and Chicago, a distance of one thousand and two miles by the shortest route, (something farther by the Albany route,) costs the Government $1,030,398.40 per annum. That is the result of weighing the mails. Some of the routes on this line received $375 a mile before the weighing of the mails; one of them, the line from Toledo to Elkhart, received $75 a mile; another of them, the line from Elyria to Millbury, received $50 a mile before the weighing of the mails.

The route from Elyria to Millbury, running alongside of the Michigan Southern road, received $50 a mile under the law regulating pay according to the grade of the service before the act of 1873 was passed; now, under what I believe to be a fraudulent weighing, it receives $705 per mile. Running alongside of the Michigan Southern, it is only necessary as a postal route to supply the way officers along it, and is not a necessary part of the great through route. The same is true of the route from Toledo to Elkhart. This route received $75 per mile before the passage of the act of 1873. It now receives $575 per mile.

I have stated the facts. Time will not allow me to go into further particulars, but I have stated the facts from the reports of the Postmaster-General for 1874 and 1875. I have them before me, but I dare not in the short remainder of my time present seriatim the figures. What I say is that I have presented you official figures.

Now, then, what is to be the effect of the bill proposed by the Committee on Appropriations to pay six or seven mills per linear foot inside-car measurement for carrying the mails between New York and Chicago? Take the shortest single route, the Erie and Michigan Southern. Under this bill the service on it will cost $1,034,681.40. That route is one thousand and two miles long. The route by way of Buffalo and Dunkirk to Chicago is longer, according to the report of the Postmaster-General, and the information which I have is that it requires upon this line two cars of sixty feet each and two cars of forty-five feet each to carry the mail matter; that is, two hundred and ten linear feet of postal cars furnished for the postal service; and I understand that the rate of trips is about eighteen a week and sometimes more. But I will assume for the purpose of my argument that there is but a single round trip a day. Take two hundred and ten feet and multiply it by fourteen mills, and multiply that by the number of days in the year, and you have the product of one single mile. Multiply this product by the length of the route from New York to Chicago, and you have as the cost of single daily service $1,034,681.40. If you put on a double daily service it will cost more than $2,000,000 annually; if you put it on the route by way of Buffalo, Albany, and Dunkirk, and on the two routes named which are parallel to the Michigan Southern, then you nearly double the rates by employing two parallel through lines, and make the amount nearly $2,000,000.

Remember now, sir, that there are over sixteen thousand miles of postal-car service to be performed under that provision of this bill besides what may be otherwise performed. If you do not make the calculation of the cost now, those of us who live to return here will have to make it next winter. I call the attention of our democratic friends to the fact that, professing retrenchment and reform, professing to reduce the expenditures of this Government, we will do a thing that will mantle our cheeks with shame when we come to see the effect of it, and that will show to this country that in depriving the rural parts of this country of mail facilities we are lavishing unnecessarily millions of dollars upon corporations which they do not earn and are not entitled to.

I thought it right to call attention in this way to this subject, and if what I have said is to be answered, I want it answered upon figures. I want it answered upon facts, and not by general declamation. It is upon figures that I tell you and tell this House that neither ten millions nor twelve millions of dollars would pay for the postal-car service under the provisions of this bill, leaving at most not more than two or three millions for all the other mail service which reaches one-half of the people of the United States.

I have, Mr. Chairman, to meet the objections which I have urged to this bill, offered amendments proposing in the first place to add to the $14,500,000 for the transportation of the mails one and a half millions of dollars so as to make the amount $16,000,000. In the next place I propose to provide that where it is said in the bill that railroads shall have six mills or seven mills per linear foot per mile run they shall not have more than six mills or more than seven mills. I propose, then, for the purpose of testing the sincerity of those who say this is a reform measure, to add at the end of section 7 a proviso that the railroad postal service shall in no case exceed $450 a mile, which is $75 more a mile than was ever paid up to the time of the passage of the act of March 3, 1873.

If this is a measure of retrenchment and reform, if it is not a measure to enrich corporations at the expense of the people, if it is meant for economy and justice, then put upon it by that amendment the limitation I have indicated, and you will do for the railroads what justice demands, you will give the Postmaster-General power to contract with them upon principles of equity and fair dealing, and you will save the people from paying a thousand dollars a mile for the postal-railway service authorized under this bill.

There are many questions, Mr. Chairman, arising under this bill which I have not time to treat satisfactorily, either to the House or to myself, in the few minutes which are left to me, and therefore I do not think it advisable to enter upon their consideration. But I appeal to our friends from all over the Union, North and South, East and West, to remember the great agency of the Post-Office Department in contributing to the intelligence, prosperity, business, and happiness of the people of this country, and to strive to save them from the wrongs which will be inflicted upon them by this bill as it now stands. Leave it in the power of the Post-Office Department to give mail facilities to the people of this country.

I am as far as any one from being willing to incur unnecessary expenditures. And, from the examination I have been able to give, my conviction is clear as sworn testimony can make it that there has been some wasteful prodigality in the Post-Office Department in past years. If the Department has been in the wrong, there is a right way, a right time, to correct it by a proper examination and exposure. If it has not been wrong, then we ought not to cripple the service upon the plea of economy, when for every million dollars that may be saved to the people you will injure them in their business, their commercial correspondence, their means of intelligence, and in their happiness many millions, if we can estimate the injury in dollars.

My idea is to make this Department efficient and to have it administered economically. My idea is that we must send these messengers with their letters of affection and of business, with their newspapers conveying intelligence of events in our own and in other lands, to every neighborhood in the Union. We should elevate our people, generalize their means of information, strengthen their understanding of questions of science and of agriculture, of political and religious questions. Give them in the march of civilization and industry those advantages which it was the design of the postal service to give them, and do not deprive them of any advantages for the benefit of a privileged class of mail-carriers and to save a small amount of appropriation from the Federal Treasury.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, having submitted a motion to suspend the rules to amend the postal-appropriation bill so as to repeal the legislation of the last Congress in doubling the rate of postage on third-class matter, I propose to address the committee on that subject. We have now before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads the bill recently passed by the Senate; and one of its most earnest and industrious advocates, especially of that feature which settles the rate of third-class matter at one cent per ounce, is the Post-master-General. The next day after the Senate bill was passed my attention was called to a letter published in the city papers, addressed to me as chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, calling the attention of the committee to the advantages of the Senate bill regulating postage on third-class matter, which was rather a novel way of bringing the subject before the committee, and was evidently intended more to influence and form public opinion than to influence the committee.

In addition to this publication I find a circular letter, inclosed in an official envelope, postage prepaid, the same as that published in the paper, sent to all the members of this House. To say the least, the Postmaster-General is taking a deep interest in the passage of a bill that the newspapers of the country charged was smuggled into a deficiency appropriation bill by the friends of express companies in the last hours of the last session of the Forty-third Congress. The country has made a note of it, that the circumstances surrounding the birth of this measure were fraught with the suspicion that some advantage was to be taken which would not bear the light of free and full discussion. The express companies were then, as they are now, thronging the lobbies of this Capitol, pressing upon the committees to report a bill doubling the rate of postage on third-class matter.

Every one knows that this House would never have passed so obnoxious an amendment if time had been given for examination. As soon as it was ascertained that such a law had passed, a storm of indignation arose, expressed by all the people who were not interested in express companies; and more than that, every member of Congress was anxious to disavow his instrumentality in passing the bill, with a promise to introduce one at the first day of Congress for repeal. The number of bills introduced for this purpose the first week of this session will attest that they deemed it a matter of great importance to set themselves right by this method. It was in obedience to this outraged public sentiment that this House passed almost unanimously, among its first measures, a bill re-establishing the old law, leaving the responsibility with the Senate, where the original blunder, or whatever name you call it, was first committed. It seems, however, that the Senate has been pleased to ignore the House bill, and a new bill proposed which contains the same obnoxious provisions of the law of last session, with a tub thrown to the whale in the shape of a reduction on the postage of transient newspapers, which it was doubtless hoped would save the bill from sharp criticism in that direction. This bill proposes to keep the postage on third-class matter at its present rate of one cent per ounce; and the Postmaster-General comes to the relief of the bill and urges the House in the name of economy—in order to bring the Post-Office Department to a self-sustaining basis—to agree to the Senate bill.

The large deficit in the Post-Office Department, increasing with each year, is made the text by the friends of Senate bill as well as the Postmaster-General why the rates of postage should be increased, evidently intending to create the impression that this deficit is chargeable, in a great degree, to the third-class matter. This is not true, and a candid investigation of all the facts in relation to the weight and cost of transportation of third-class matter will develop the fact that the charge is not only erroneous but that if this bill becomes a law the loss on third-class matter will be increased instead of diminished. In that connection I invite the attention of the House to the following facts: It is certainly true of all mail matter, whether it be letters, papers, books, or merchandise, that the largest amount in weight and number of pieces starts from the great commercial marts, the business centers of the country, and this weight is decreased as it travels westward or toward the less densely populated districts of our country. Every class of mail matter is continually falling off as you move away from the thickly settled States. The conclusion is therefore inevitable that much the largest amount of mail matter is transported only a few hundred miles from the Atlantic coast, and the revenue that accrues to the Government is made by the transportation of mail matter over this distance. The distance being short, the cost of transportation small, the Government makes money on all classes except the second class and begins to lose only when it gets beyond the point where transportation costs more than the postage you prepay.

Now, if you fix the rate of postage on third-class matter at such a price per ounce or pound that express companies can and will carry it for a certain distance cheaper than that rate, every one will see in a moment that this will amount to a practical exclusion from the mails of all such matter. So long as the express companies can transport at a profit we will assume that they will transport all packages of third-class matter for less than the rate fixed by the Senate bill, which is one cent per ounce or sixty-four cents per pound. We also believe that this point is from six to eight hundred miles from the Atlantic coast.

I am informed that Adams Express Company will transport packages six inches square, weighing over two and not exceeding five pounds and not over $10 in value, from New York, Philadelphia, or Washington to Chicago or Saint Louis for forty cents. From Boston, such packages to the points named would cost fifty cents. When taken into the territory of other express companies in the South, or west of the Mississippi, an additional charge is made; but it can be safely asserted that the rate per pound for four-pound packages is not more than ten cents per pound.

If this is true, when the Senate bill becomes a law the express companies will transport all packages of third-class matter this distance, cutting off this source of revenue to the Post-Office Department, leaving to the Government the elephant of transporting it only beyond that point where the express companies will not carry it. This view cuts off all chance of revenue to the Post-Office Department for any distance, making every package a burden and expense to the Government. Indeed, it looks as if we were legislating to give the express companies all this class of mail when it will pay us a revenue, and only place it in the mail-bags when it has to travel such long distances that we know it will bring us in debt. Yet we are told by the friends of this measure, including the Postmaster-General, that it will go a great way toward making the Post-Office Department a self-sustaining institution. This view is very clearly set forth in the letter of Mr. Jewell, when he says:

This bill—

Alluding to the Senate bill—

keeps the rate of third-class matter at a rate where the mails will not be flooded by those who would have the Department do a freighting business, and yet low enough for all those who use the mails in forwarding small packages, either because more convenient or for the reason that there are no other forwarding facilities within reach.

The reason the mails will not be flooded by those who wish the Department to do a freighting business very clearly being that the express companies would do it for them for a distance of several hundred miles from the Atlantic seaboard. But I have no doubt that it has occurred to the House that if the Senate bill is passed the Department must go on with this freighting business in the remote and isolated sections, where the cost, according to a table of Mr. Jewell's own making, will be three times as much as the postage. According to this table the cost per pound from New York to New Orleans is $23\frac{33}{100}$ cents; from New York to Galveston $30\frac{40}{100}$ cents, and from New York to San Francisco, $33\frac{18}{100}$ cents; for these rates the Government will transport third-class matter at a loss, according to the Senate bill, of 29 cents to New Orleans, 57 cents to Galveston, and 68 cents to San Francisco on each four-pound package. This is all loss and no profit, and will leave the Department with a heavier deficit than heretofore. Is this what the Postmaster-General calls running the Post-Office Department on business principles?

The doubling of postage not only gave the express companies the merchandise, but books, at all points within a radius of five or seven hundred miles of the great trading centers. Remember in this connection that all third-class matter, according to the Postmaster-General's report, as well as the letter of Colonel Bangs, the fast-mail line projector, between all points five hundred miles distant from New York costs less than eight cents per pound. The passage of the act of last session effectually precludes all books and merchandise, all third-class four-pound packages, on that part of the mail service within five hundred miles of New York or other great cities, where it would pay a large revenue to the Postal Department, and transferred it to the express companies, leaving to the mail service only such packages as go beyond the point where it ceases to pay them. In other words, if a package is sent to any point east of Chicago it can be sent cheaper than one cent an ounce by express, and the Post-Office loses the revenue; but beyond that the mails can carry and welcome, because it no longer pays the express companies.

The result of the repeal of the old law has been that the express companies have had an increase of profits, and the Postal Department have lost revenue. This is certainly not just to the interests of the people or the Government, and it is not at all surprising that an indignant remonstrance has come up from every part of the country and from all classes of people that this wrong should be speedily corrected.

Now, in order to show to the House that I am correct in the assumption that the Post-Office would derive a revenue from the transmission of all third-class matter in the mails to any point, say five hundred miles of the great commercial centers, I will read to you the estimated cost of transporting mail matter per pound to a number of given points, taken from the report of the Postmaster-General for 1875, remembering that we propose in the amendment before the House to carry third-class matter at eight cents per pound.

Now, it is assumed by Mr. Jewell, and also in the debate that occurred in the Senate on this question, that third-class matter constituted 38 per cent. of all mail matter, as you can see by referring to tabular statement furnished by the Postmaster-General to the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and printed in Senator HAMLIN'S speech. This in my judgment is very unjust, and I will call the attention of the House to the manner of arriving at this supposed fact. Mr. Bangs, who was superintendent of railway service, in obedience to an instruction from the Postmaster-General issued a circular to fifty of the largest offices in the United States to send to the Postal Department the amounts of all mail matter sent out from each office in the month of December, 1874. But I will read from Mr. Bangs's letter, which you will find in Miscellaneous Document No. 93, Senate, Forty-third Congress, second session:

By your direction, and in order that reliable information of the relative amounts of different classes of mail matter might be obtained, this office issued a circular letter to fifty of the largest offices in the United States, including those that were known to issue the largest quantity of the class referred to. The month of December, 1874, was selected, as, during the latter part of that month, the mails would be most likely used to a great extent in the forwarding of holiday goods.

By referring to the detailed statement hereunto annexed, the following results will be seen:

For the four weeks commencing December 1, the fifty offices issued 4,543,048 pounds of all classes of mail-matter.

380,574 pounds, or 8.4 per cent., was of the first class.

2,791,769 pounds, or 61.4 per cent., was of the second class.

1,370,705 pounds, or 30.2 per cent., was of the third class.

Of the third class, 110,473 pounds, 2.4 per cent. of the total of all classes, embraced "samples of merchandise."

In order that the increase, if any, during the holidays might be seen, the returns of the first week were formulated, showing the following result:

Total weight of mail matter of all classes, 1,186,991 pounds.

100,059 pounds, or 8.4 per cent., was of the first class.

752,003 pounds, or 63.4 per cent., was of the second class.

334,929 pounds, or 28.2 per cent., was of the third class.

Of the third class, 22,356 pounds, or 1.8 per cent. of the total of all classes, embraced samples of merchandise.

It will be seen that the relative amount of letter-mail of the first class was constant for the four weeks; that of the second class was 2 per cent. less for the four weeks than for the first week; while the matter of the third class increased from 28.2 per cent. for the first week to 30.2 per cent. for the four weeks, an increase of 2 per cent. The principal items of this increase would be found in "samples of merchandise," which increased from 1.8 per cent. for the first week to 2.4 per cent. for the four weeks, and "books," which increased from 3.95 per cent. for the first week to 4.5 per cent. for the four weeks, verifying the supposition that the mails would be largely used during the holidays for the forwarding of this class of matter.

Now the House will please take notice that the month of December was selected because during the latter part of that month the mails would most likely be used to forward holiday goods, and the statement verifies that supposition, showing a large increase. Still this statement is made the basis of ascertaining the percentage of third-class mail matter that passes through for the whole year. Afterward the same kind of statements were procured from two hundred and nine other of the largest offices in the month of January, 1875, making in all two hundred and fifty-nine of the largest offices in the United States. This list included all the large offices on all the great railroad lines and navigable rivers. They were the commercial cities, the great trading centers of the country from Maine to California and from Minnesota to the Gulf. Third-class matter, consisting of books, magazines, circulars, and merchandise, would as a matter of business start from these offices.

No one would write to an obscure town for samples of merchandise. Books and magazines are not printed in such places and circulars in large numbers are only sent out from great business centers. I do not believe there is a magazine or periodical of extensive circulation printed outside of these cities and not a single publishing-house of any consequence. The fact is that third-class matter is confined almost exclusively to the cities named as a starting point, and you will only find it in any considerable quantity where commerce thrives and flourishes. Books, which form a large percentage of this matter, are written for because they cannot be procured in the small towns. And the same reasons will apply to all classifications of third-class matter, except perhaps bulbs and roots. Now the Postmaster-General assumes in the table referred to that, because these two hundred and fifty-nine offices pay 50 per cent. of the revenue to the Postal Department, there is also an equal amount of third-class matter started or mailed from all other offices in the United States and Territories. This may be true in regard to letters, as there is not a post-office, however obscure, that does not send out hundreds of letters, while there are thousands that do not mail in the course of an entire year a book, magazine, or sample of merchandise. It is from this kind of data that the conclusion is reached that third-class matter constitutes 38 per cent. of the mails, and is therefore chargeable with 38 per cent. of the cost of transporting and handling all mail matter.

The House will find on an examination of the tabular statement as printed in Senator HAMLIN'S speech that it is charged a much larger amount for transportation and handling than second-class matter. The latter is estimated for the period of one year to be 55,783,832 pounds, while third-class for the same period is estimated at 42,351,308 pounds, being 13,432,524 pounds less than the second class. The charge for transporting and handling second class is estimated at $7,969,240, while third class is estimated at $8,772,559. Third class is less in weight more than 13,000,000 pounds, but is charged $803,319 more than the second class. This is on the theory, I suppose, that the cost of handling is much greater; but the general superintendent who collected the statistics had a different notion at the time he made his report. He says:

Whether this class of mail matter is remunerative or not has been questioned. It cannot be placed upon the same footing with either letters or regular publications, for these reasons: In all post-offices the number of clerks necessary is determined almost entirely by the first and second classes. There must be force enough to dispose of these classes in the quickest possible time; while matter of the third class, where the quantity is of any moment, is distributed and handled at leisure, and therefore serves to fill in the intervals that would otherwise be wasted. Its handling is therefore less expensive, piece for piece or pound for pound, than either first or second class mail.

In transportation, a certain system of routes is necessarily maintained. On all stage-routes and steamboat lines weight is not considered, unless it be in a very few and exceptional cases, speed and frequency regulating the cost. The weights on this class of routes could be doubled without material increase of compensation.

In railroad transportation, fully one-fourth of the annual compensation is to railroads on which the weight could be largely increased without raising their compensation above the minimum; fully one-half is to railroads upon which an increase in weight would increase their compensation at the minimum rate per ton.

So, that, of the $16,000,000 paid for transportation, $9,000,000 would not be materially affected by doubling the mails; $3,000,000 only would increase directly with the weights, and $4,000,000 would increase indirectly with the weights.

I have introduced these statements to show the fallacy of all arguments that have been produced to show that the deficiency of the Post-Office Department is attributable to the samples of merchandise, which form hardly a perceptible portion of the mails, or to matter of the third class, which forms but 30 per cent., and yields about 24 per cent. of the revenue, against 61.4 per cent. of mail-matter of the second class and 8.4 per cent of the first class.

Very respectfully,

GEORGE S. BANGS,
General Superintendent Railway Mail Service.

Hon. MARSHALL JEWELL,
Postmaster-General.

The only additional cost that is incurred by admitting this class of matter in the mails is the increase of clerks in a small proportion and the transportation per pound over railroads. Suppose, on the other hand, you keep such matter out of the mails, and how much does it decrease the cost of the postal system? You must still have the same official machinery at this city; you must still keep the thirty-five thousand postmasters and most of the clerks now employed; you will still have the 208,000 miles of stage-coach and steamboat lines, on which weight is not considered, and you will be short the revenue of four and a half millions which this matter now contributes to the Postal Department.

We must also consider in this connection that the introduction of this class of matter into the mail pays a large indirect revenue by stimulating correspondence.

Millions of pamphlets, occasional publications, transient newspapers, hand-bills, posters, and unsealed circulars, as will be seen by the examination of a tabular statement which I will publish with my remarks, are sent out monthly by the business enterprise of the country, by all of which correspondence is certainly stimulated to an immense degree.

Tabular statement of the several items composing third-class matter mailed at two hundred and fifty-nine of the principal post-offices in the United States for one month, as shown by tables B and C of the published letter prepared by the Post-Office Department to show the cost, &c., of carrying the different classes of mail matter.

Divisions of third-class mail matter.	Number of pieces.	Weight, pounds.	Percentage of whole.
First division—Pamphlets, occasional publications, transient newspapers, magazines, hand-bills, posters, prospectuses	6,078,417	986,545	60.25
Second division—Unsealed circulars	5,190,610	100,703	6.15
Third division—Books and book manuscript	174,168	227,233	13.87
Fourth division—Samples of merchandise	276,575	139,538	8.52
Fifth division—Seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, scions	22,167	33,480	2.04
Sixth division—All other articles of third class	229,619	149,763	9.14
Whole weight for thirty days at 259 cities	.....	1,637,312	.....

This table was prepared from the report to which I have alluded, that of Colonel Bangs to the Postmaster-General; and I have no doubt many of you who have imagined that merchandise constituted any considerable proportion of the so-called third-class matter will be a little astounded to learn that a very large percentage of this class is transient newspapers, circulars, and books, and such articles as would not be likely to travel to the frontiers to find their address.

Notwithstanding all this, every speech that is made and every article that is published, the unanimous voice of the express companies chiming in, starts out on the theory that third-class matter is responsible for a very large part of the deficit that is annually declared to exist in the Post-Office Department. It is a convenient pack-horse, and has been used to the best advantage.

The great leaks that bring this Department in debt lie behind the cost of any class of mail matter, and is chargeable to causes that grow out of the careless and unbusiness-like management of the Department itself, and I believe when these faults are corrected we will no longer hear of a deficit in its accounts.

[Mr. HOLMAN addressed the committee, but on account of indisposition did not conclude. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The hour for closing debate on this bill under the order of the House has now arrived.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest by unanimous consent that the time be extended so that the gentleman from Indiana, who is not well, may finish his remarks hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done only by an order of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I now suggest the committee rise; and when we go into the House we can go on with the morning hour. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having taken the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. RANDALL. By a former order of the House general debate on the bill was closed at four o'clock. I ask that when the House shall again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on this bill there be an extension of time for general debate sufficient to enable the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to complete his remarks.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LOUISIANA INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to appropriate $12,000 to pay the expenses of the select committee to investigate the Federal offices in Louisiana.

The bill was read. It proposes to appropriate $12,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of the select committee charged with the investigation of the Federal offices in Louisiana.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not wish to object to this bill; but it is unusual. This should be paid out of the contingent fund.

Mr. GIBSON. I have introduced the bill in this form at the suggestion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOSKINS,] a member of the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. HURLBUT. If it is to come out of the contingent fund, the amount must be less or nothing.

Mr. FOSTER. I withdraw the objection.

The bill (H. R. No. 3368) was received, and read a first and second time.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest that the amount named in the bill is a large sum. I think we had better commence with $5,000.

Mr. HURLBUT. It is a large committee, and it is a hot place to which they are going, and they have a big job on hand.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Louisiana that there should be a clause added to the bill providing that this sum shall be added to the contingent fund of the House. This will bring the appropriation under the control of the Clerk. The bill does not place it under the control of anybody.

Mr. HOSKINS. The appropriation of $10,000 for the committee that goes South raised in the other House was put in an appropriation bill, and became a law in the form of a special appropriation for that purpose. There is no money in the contingent fund of the House to pay the expenses of this committee, and unless this bill, or some such bill, passes no money can be had for the purpose.

Mr. GIBSON. I will agree to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Add to the bill these words:
> Said appropriation to be added to the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. That puts it in the control of the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question being taken on ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time, there were—ayes 53, noes 26; no quorum voting.

Mr. RUSK. A quorum has not voted. You cannot appropriate money without a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. RUSK, and the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. GIBSON.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 72, noes 24.

Before the report of the tellers was announced,

Mr. RANDALL said: Mr. Speaker, is the bill still open to amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not too late to amend the bill. The previous question is not operating.

Mr. GIBSON. Then, at the suggestion of several gentlemen, I move to amend by striking out "$12,000," and inserting in lieu thereof "$9,000."

Mr. BLOUNT. That is what the other committee had.

Mr. NEAL. I move to amend the amendment by striking out $9,000 and inserting $5,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

Mr. GIBSON. I move to reconsider the vote on the amendment making the amount $5,000.

Mr. HOSKINS. I believe the motion to reconsider is debatable?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HOSKINS. I simply desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that they have ordered a select committee to go to New Orleans to make an investigation of certain matters in relation to the Federal officers in that city, and that this investigation will cost money. An appropriation was made of about $60,000 to the contingent fund of the House by the deficiency bill, and I am told by those who ought to know that the outstanding claims against that fund are more than sufficient to consume the entire appropriation. It is perfectly idle to suppose that a committee of this House can go to New Orleans and make a proper investigation unless a sufficient amount is provided to defray the necessary expenses. The sum of $5,000 is of no account for that purpose. There are nine members of the committee. It will cost each member $100 to go there, $200 to get there and back; and every gentleman must know that $3,000 to pay other expenses of the committee and for the subpœnaing, witnesses, &c., is not sufficient. I would, therefore, suggest to the House that they either refuse any appropriation and let the committee remain here in this city, or give them an amount sufficient to enable them to do the work.

Mr. GIBSON. I would like to state, also, in addition to what the gentleman from New York has said, that a few days ago this House voted an appropriation of $10,000 to defray the expenses of the committee of the Senate appointed to examine into the political affairs of Mississippi, a committee consisting of five members; and now, when a committee selected by this House, both republicans and democrats, come before the House and ask them to appropriate $12,000 to carry on this investigation, and an amendment is offered reducing it to $9,000, I cannot see with what consistency gentlemen can vote down the proposition.

Mr. BANKS. The House, by unanimous consent, a few days ago ordered this investigation, and it would present the House in a very singular attitude before the country if now it refused to allow that committee to go by failing to make the appropriations for its expenses. It seems to me that if the sum is reasonable—and I think that $9,000 would be—the House ought to grant it without any question. It would discredit the House to take this means of defeating that to which it had given its unanimous consent.

Mr. BLAINE. There is this consideration also in regard to this matter, that it does not make a particle of difference whether the appropriation is made now or hereafter. When the committee goes to perform its duties, its proper expenses will be paid, and those expenses must be paid on vouchers, and it makes no difference whether we make the appropriation now or hereafter; we have got to make it. We have ordered this duty to be performed. It is in the hands of a committee who have the confidence of the House; of course what they expend in the discharge of their duties must be paid, and it may as well be appropriated for in advance as hereafter.

Mr. GARFIELD. One of two things must be done: either we must rescind the order creating the committee or pay the proper sum for their expenses. Of course I think we ought to pay it. I hope there will be no objection to passing a reasonable appropriation.

Mr. CONGER. A very considerable portion of this fund must be taken by the committee with them, or by its officers, for the payment of witnesses' fees, and without such fund being on hand for that purpose the committee will very soon find that it will fail in securing the attendance of witnesses. That is one kind of voucher that cannot be paid after the return of the committee. I believe it has been the universal custom of the House to designate appropriations when there was not sufficient in the contingent fund for the use of investigating committees sent to places remote from the capital. It has been so I know in the investigations of former Congresses, and within my recollection a very large sum of money was expended for the express purpose of paying witnesses' fees and securing their attendance. An investigating committee must have witnesses, and I am free to say that if the House orders an investigation I think it proper that the amount of money necessary to make that investigation should be at the disposal of the Clerk of the House or of the committee. The appropriation limits the amount to what is necessary. I suppose there is some rule on the subject. There always has been, and the amount allowed for expenses of committees, and under that rule the amount necessary out of this appropriation, will be paid, and the balance remains as a part of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. FRYE. I am not opposed to an appropriation such as may be necessary for the purpose of a proper investigation of these offices, but when I was down in New Orleans on an investigating committee I found this to be true: that if we would have consented to have paid all the witnesses whose testimony was offered in Louisiana when we were there we might have been compelled to stay there for three months and would have examined five hundred witnesses on each side. Each side is represented in these investigations. The one antagonizes the other. Each is anxious to put in witnesses, and if a committee has a reasonable limit put upon the amount of money it shall expend that committee can do what we did when we thought we had got to the limit, and that was to say to the parties: "Now, gentlemen, if you want to examine more witnesses you must examine them without expenses; we are not authorized to pay any more expenses."

It is a very expensive business. I saw a letter in the hands of a member of Congress the other day from away out in Colorado, in which the writer said that he knew something about the Belknap business, he or his partner having been connected with the sale of a post-tradership, and he wanted that member to call on the investigating committee and have him summoned before them forthwith; and on the other page he added as a postscript the following:

My dear friend, I am exceedingly desirous of visiting Philadelphia at the Centennial and I am short of funds; I hope you will not neglect to give the letter on the opposite page to the committee.

Now, Louisiana is no different from Colorado, and if these gentlemen go there with an unlimited amount of money, if they go there with twelve thousand or twenty thousand dollars, they will use every dollar of it, because witnesses will be crowding in upon them to be examined.

Mr. GIBSON. How much was used by the committee of investigation of which the gentleman was a member?

Mr. FRYE. My recollection is about $9,000; and if we had not told these men that the limit was reached they would have had hundreds more of witnesses on each side.

Mr. GIBSON. Is it not doing injustice to the gentlemen who compose this committee to assume that they will not be as economical and faithful to their public duty as the gentlemen who composed that committee?

Mr. FRYE. There is this difference: Here is a special bill fixing an amount. Now it is generally considered that where the amount is fixed you may go to that amount. We had no amount fixed but we fixed it by stopping the examination of witnesses. Now I do not object to an appropriation of $9,000; I think that is not unreasonable.

Mr. GIBSON. I have fixed the amount at that sum.

Mr. FRYE. I understood the amount to be $12,000.

Mr. GIBSON. No; $9,000.

Mr. FRYE. Then I have no objection whatever; I do not think that an unreasonable sum for a committee of nine members.

The question was taken on the motion to reconsider the vote substituting "$5,000" for "$9,000;" and it was agreed to.

The motion to insert "$5,000" was not agreed to; and the motion to insert "$9,000" was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GIBSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLERK FOR REAL-ESTATE POOL COMMITTEE.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana, from the Committee of Accounts, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Investigation of the Real-Estate Pool and Jay Cooke & Co.'s Indebtedness be, and they are hereby, allowed to retain the services of a clerk for a period of thirty days from the 15th day of April, 1876.

CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Select Committee on the Centennial Exhibition, reported the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the two Houses of Congress accept the invitation of the Centennial Commission to attend the ceremonies to be observed at the opening of the international exhibition of 1876, on the 10th instant, at Philadelphia; and that to that end when the respective Houses shall adjourn on Tuesday, the 9th instant, it shall be to meet at twelve o'clock meridian on Friday the 12th instant.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I move to amend the resolution by substituting "Thursday the 11th instant" for "Friday the 12th instant."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. TEESE. I move to amend the resolution so as to make it read "Saturday the 13th instant."

Mr. RANDALL. That would cut off private-bill day.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLERK FOR COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BEEBE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the time for which the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department was authorized to employ a clerk is hereby extended from the period heretofore fixed to the end of the present month.

SCARCITY OF FRACTIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. BLAINE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to consider at once some measure for the relief of the country from the threatened scarcity of fractional currency.

Mr. RANDALL. That subject is before the Committee on Banking and Currency, and they have unanimously agreed to a report upon it.

Mr. BLAINE. That was the reason I have named the Committee of Ways and Means in my resolution, because the other committee does not seem to have been able to reach the object.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The question of currency goes to the Committee on Banking and Currency, I believe, while the subjects of legal-tenders and revenue go to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. RANDALL. I suppose the object of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] is to secure the reporting of some measure immediately to the House under the right of the Committee of Ways and Means to report at any time, contradistinguished from the Committee on Banking and Currency, which can report only when regularly called. Is that the object of the gentleman?

Mr. BLAINE. That is one object. And I also think this subject rather belongs to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I think the line of the powers and prerogatives of the two committees is very well determined. The subject of the currency evidently does not belong to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BLAINE. Where currency is in the nature of a public debt it belongs to the Committee of Ways and Means; and all that relates to the legal-tender notes has been considered as within the province of the Ways and Means Committee. Of course I do not want to take anything from any other committee by arrogating to the committee I am myself a member of that which does not belong to it.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PAYNE,] on the day before yesterday, sought to submit a unanimous report on this subject from the Committee on Banking and Currency. Perhaps he might be able to do so now.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not think there would be any objection to that bill now.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I think one of the largest humbugs of the day is the attempt to resume specie payments partially with this silver currency.

Mr. BLAINE. That is the very subject I want our committee to consider.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Silver currency commands 5 per cent. premium in New York, and the more you issue of it the more it will be hoarded and the larger will be the premium. It operates as a measure of contraction without any of the benefit of contracting the currency.

Mr. BLAINE. The resolution I have just offered does not specify any particular time; it merely directs the committee to consider some measure of relief.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] mean to say that this "wretched silver currency" which we have issued is hoarded by the people and is at a premium?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I mean to say that this silver currency which Congress has authorized to be issued cannot be floated in this country in lieu of the fractional currency now in existence. If you were to give to the State of Indiana or Ohio $10,000,000 of this silver currency it would soon find its way to the large money-centers of the country, because a premium is paid for it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am very glad to hear that it is so good.

Mr. RANDALL. It is at a premium only because there is not enough of it.

Mr. KELLEY. We were getting along very well. There was no scarcity of small currency; many people were reasonably well employed in making it, and the Government was re-imbursed its cost by its consumption. We can describe our case by quoting the epitaph with which you, Mr. Speaker, are familiar:

I was well; I would be better; I took physic, and here I am.

We fell into company with some Nevada doctors, and they told us that by a little blood-letting, by depleting the Treasury of a couple of millions of gold a year, by mortgaging the future labor and industry of the country for the purchase of silver, we could improve our condition and enjoy better fractional currency. Absurd as their advice sounded to practical men, we adopted it. Accordingly, we are under bonds—at least, under bonds for $17,000,000 and are getting under more—by virtue of which, at the end of twenty years from the issue of the last of them, we shall have paid in solid payments of gold over $40,000,000 of interest plus compound interest thereon, calculated at quarterly rests. We shall then owe just $40,000,000, the principal of the bonds in gold, and are likely to be without any currency of any kind to represent either the gold paid as interest on the bonds on which further payments will have to be made with which to make our small exchanges.

Mr. BLAINE. My friend from Pennsylvania will observe that he is hanging an enormous hat on my little peg. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. Exactly. Though small, it is a very good peg to hang a big hat on. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. It is a mere resolution of inquiry.

Mr. KELLEY. What has been said by those who understood the subject from the first suggestion of a project of this kind now comes true—that whenever it should be attempted the people would be left without fractional currency; that fools would be made to believe that because the metal looked white and bright it was silver, that it was intrinsically worth the amount expressed on its face; in short, that it was, like fractional notes, money. Now, it is not silver. It is not silver, tested even by the standard dollar of the country. That it is fine silver nobody will allege. Nor is it money. It is a token coinage with which you can pay $5 in any one payment, but cannot pay more. It is not a legal tender for more, as fractional notes are. It is a token coinage deliberately debased to the end that it shall not be exportable. Yet it is in danger of being exported.

Mr. GARFIELD. Why do people hoard it?

Mr. KELLEY. It is liable to be exported, because it is made of a commodity the value of which is subject to extreme fluctuations, and may go to a greater value than it expresses or may not. I have shown why fools hoard it. Mothers hoard it because it is good for young children to cut teeth upon, especially now while the coinage-marks are sharp upon it and will operate upon the gums; and older children like it because it will jingle in their money-jugs and toy savings-banks. Thus it retires from circulation almost as soon as issued. I read in the newspapers yesterday that American silver was worth 5 per cent. premium, and I wondered how it could be so; but as I read on I found that the writer spoke not specially of silver but of fractional currency, whether paper or silver; that is, that American silver was worth the premium provided the denomination in which it had been coined was such as would enable a man to pay for a couple of cigars, or to enable gentlemen who take such things to pay for a toddy; in other words, that would make the ordinary small exchanges of life. People must have fractional currency, and will, if necessary, pay a premium for it, even though it be made of debased silver.

Now, sir, I give notice that I shall object to any extraordinary legislation on this subject. We have submitted the question to Providence. Our legislation upon which both Houses deliberated for days ought to be good for a fortnight at least; and I am willing to give Providence a month to knock away at it with the logic of events. [Laughter.] By that time I apprehend we shall conclude that we have not done a good thing in undertaking to pay $2,000,000 gold annually for the privilege of bulling the silver market and making metallic fractional change for the people.

Mr. BLAINE. Nevertheless, I shall ask the House to pass this very innocent resolution. It goes to a committee that will be enlightened with all the knowledge of my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] who is a member of that committee.

Mr. KELLEY. But I shall be overshadowed by the folly of all the rest of the committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania very often, in his financial trials, meets with eleven contrary jurymen.

Mr. KELLEY. But does not the gentleman know that he who has the Almighty on his side is a majority, although he seems to be but one among eleven? [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Is the resolution of the gentleman from Maine before the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. SPRINGER. I offer the following as a substitute——

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know whether I shall yield for that substitute until I hear it read. I may prefer to test the sense of the House directly on my resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. I offer the following as a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from Maine:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be, and are hereby, instructed to report to the House to-morrow a bill repealing so much of the act passed at this session as provides for the redemption of fractional currency in silver coin.

Mr. BLAINE. I prefer to have a vote upon my resolution as I have offered it. Of course it is for the House to say whether I shall have a direct vote upon it; but I ask the previous question.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] would not be in order at any rate without unanimous consent.

Mr. BLAINE. Still I would prefer to have the sense of the House directly on my resolution. I therefore ask the previous question.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move to lay both resolutions on the table.

Several MEMBERS. Let the resolution be again read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the original resolution, which is the only one before the House.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I thought I was recognized to offer a substitute for this resolution.

Mr. BLAINE. I held the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understood that the gentleman had yielded the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. O, no; these other gentlemen were speaking in my time.

Mr. SPRINGER. The previous question had not been ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine never yielded the floor. He allowed the debate to go on in his hour. That was the understanding of the Chair.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution of Mr. BLAINE was adopted, there being—ayes 124, noes 31.

Mr. BLAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MORE SILVER COIN.

Mr. PAYNE. I asked leave the other day to report from the Committee on Banking and Currency relating to the issue of silver coin. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] who then objected now withdraws his objection, and I again ask unanimous consent to present the resolution.

Mr. KELLEY. I renew the objection. I think an act of Congress ought to stand for thirty days at least. [Laughter.]

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 3356) authorizing the transfer of a certain appropriation; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 110) authorizing the exhibition of a life-saving station-house at the centennial exposition.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I have given very attentive consideration to a resolution of the House of Representatives passed on the 3d day of April, requesting the President of the United States to inform the House whether any executive offices, acts, or duties, and, if any, what, have within a specified period been performed at a distance from the seat of government established by law, &c.

I have never hesitated and shall not hesitate to communicate to Congress, and to either branch thereof, all the information which the Constitution makes it the duty of the President to give or which my judgment may suggest to me or a request from either House may indicate to me will be useful in the discharge of the appropriate duties confided to them. I fail, however, to find in the Constitution of the United States the authority given to the House of Representatives (one branch of the Congress in which is vested the legislative power of the Government) to require of the Executive, an independent branch of the Government—co-ordinate with the Senate and House of Representatives—an account of his discharge of his appropriate and purely executive offices, acts, and duties, either as to when, where, or how performed.

What the House of Representatives may require as a right in its demand upon the Executive for information is limited to what is necessary for the proper discharge of its powers of legislation or of impeachment.

The inquiry in the resolution of the House as to where executive acts have within the last seven years been performed and at what distance from any particular spot or for how long a period at any one time, &c., does not necessarily belong to the province of legislation. It does not profess to be asked for that object.

If this information be sought through an inquiry of the President as to his executive acts in view or in aid of the power of impeachment vested in the House, it is asked in derogation of an inherent natural right, recognized in this country by a constitutional guarantee which protects every citizen, the President as well as the humblest in the land, from being made a witness against himself.

During the time that I have had the honor to occupy the position of President of this Government, it has been, and while I continue to occupy that position it will continue to be, my earnest endeavor to recognize and to respect the several trusts and duties and powers of the co ordinate branches of the Government, not encroaching upon them nor allowing encroachments upon the proper powers of the office which the people of the United States have confided to me, but aiming to preserve in their proper relations the several powers and functions of each of the co-ordinate branches of the Government agreeably to the Constitution and in accordance with the solemn oath which I have taken to "preserve, protect, and defend" that instrument.

In maintenance of the rights secured by the Constitution to the executive branch of the Government, I am compelled to decline any specific or detailed answer to the request of the House for information as to "any executive offices, acts, or duties, and, if any, what, have been performed at a distance from the seat of Government established by law and for how long a period at any one time and in what part of the United States."

If, however, the House of Representatives desires to know whether during the period of upward of seven years during which I have held the office of President of the United States I have been absent from the seat of government and whether during that period I have performed or have neglected to perform the duties of my office, I freely inform the House that from the time of my entrance upon my office I have been in the habit, as were all of my predecessors, (with the exception of one who lived only one month after assuming the duties of his office and one whose continued presence in Washington was necessary from the existence at the time of a powerful rebellion,) of absenting myself at times from the seat of government; and that during such absences I did not neglect or forego the obligations or the duties of my office, but continued to discharge all of the executive offices, acts, and duties which were required of me as the President of the United States. I am not aware that a failure occurred in any one instance of my exercising the functions and powers of my office in every case requiring their discharge or of my exercising all necessary executive acts in whatever part of the United States I may at the time have been. Fortunately, the rapidity of travel and of mail communication and the facility of almost instantaneous correspondence with the offices at the seat of government which the telegraph affords to the President in whatever section of the Union he may be enable him in these days to maintain as constant and almost as quick intercourse with the Departments at Washington as may be maintained while he remains in the capital.

The necessity of the performance of executive acts by the President of the United States exists and is devolved upon him, wherever he may be within the United States during his term of office, by the Constitution of the United States.

His civil powers are no more limited or capable of limitation as to the place where they shall be exercised than are those which he might be required to discharge in his capacity of Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, which latter powers, it is evident, he might be called upon to exercise possibly even without the limits of the United States. Had the efforts of those recently in rebellion against the Government been successful in driving a late President of the United States from Washington, it is manifest that he must have discharged his functions, both civil and military, elsewhere than in the place named by law as the seat of government.

No act of Congress can limit, suspend, or confine this constitutional duty. I am not aware of the existence of any act of Congress which assumes thus to limit or restrict the exercise of the functions of the Executive. Were there such acts, I should nevertheless recognize the superior authority of the Constitution and should exercise the powers required thereby of the President.

The act to which reference is made in the resolution of the House relates to the establishing of the seat of government and the providing of suitable buildings and removal thereto of the offices attached to the Government, &c. It was not understood at its date and by General Washington to confine the President in the discharge of his duties and powers to actual presence at the seat of government. On the 30th of March, 1791, shortly after the passage of the act referred to, General Washington issued an executive proclamation having reference to the subject of this very act from Georgetown, a place remote from Philadelphia, which then was the seat of government, where the act referred to directed that "all offices attached to the seat of government" should for the time remain.

That none of his successors have entertained the idea that their executive offices could be performed only at the seat of government is evidenced by the hundreds upon hundreds of such acts performed by my predecessors, in unbroken line from Washington to Lincoln, a memorandum of the general nature and character of some of which acts is submitted herewith; and no question has ever been raised as to the validity of these acts or as to the right and propriety of the Executive to exercise the powers of his office in any part of the United States.

U. S. GRANT.

WASHINGTON, May 4, 1876.

Memorandum of absences of the Presidents of the United States from the national capital during each of the several administrations, and of public and executive acts performed during the time of such absences.

PRESIDENT WASHINGTON was frequently absent from the Capital; he appears to have been thus absent at least one hundred and eighty-one days during his term.

During his several absences he discharged official and executive duties, among them:

In March, 1791, he issued a proclamation, dated at Georgetown, in reference to running the boundary for the territory of the permanent seat of the Government.

From Mount Vernon he signed an official letter to the Emperor of Morocco, and from the same place the commission of Oliver Walcott as Comptroller of the Treasury, and the proclamation respecting the whisky insurrection in Pennsylvania; also, various sea letters, the proclamation of the treaty of 1795 between the United States and Spain, the executive order of August 4, 1792, relative to the duties on distilled spirits, &c.

When at Germantown he signed the commission of John Brackenridge as attorney of the United States for Kentucky, and that of engineer of the United States Mint.

He proposed to have Mr. Trujo officially presented, as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from Spain, to him at Mount Vernon; but, although Mr. Trujo went there for the purpose, the ceremony of presentation was prevented by Mr. Trujo's having accidentally left his credentials.

PRESIDENT JOHN ADAMS.

President John Adams was absent from the capital during his term of four years, on various occasions, three hundred and eighty-five days.

He discharged official duties and performed the most solemn public acts at Quincy, in the same manner as when at the seat of Government.

In 1797 (August 25) he forwarded to the Secretary of State a number of passports which he had signed at Quincy.

He issued at Quincy commissions to numerous officers of various grades, civil and military.

On the 28th of September, 1797, he forwarded to the Secretary of State a commission for a Justice of the Supreme Court, signed in blank at Quincy, instructing the Secretary to fill it with the name of John Marshall if he would accept, and if not, Bushrod Washington. He issued a proclamation opening trade with certain ports of Saint Domingo, and signed warrants for the execution of two soldiers, and for a pardon.

PRESIDENT JEFFERSON

was absent from the seat of Government, during his two terms of office, seven hundred and ninety-six days, more than one-fourth of the whole official period.

During his absence he signed and issued from Monticello seventy-five commissions, one letter to the Emperor of Russia, and nine letters of credence to diplomatic agents of the United States, accredited to other governments.

PRESIDENT MADISON

was absent from the seat of Government during his two presidential terms six hundred and thirty-seven days.

He signed and issued from Montpelier, during his absence from the capital, seventy-one commissions, one proclamation, and nine letters of credence to ministers, accrediting them to foreign governments, and, as it appears, transacted generally all the necessary routine business incident to the executive office.

PRESIDENT MONROE

was absent from the capital, during his presidential service of eight years, seven hundred and eight days, independent of the year 1824, and the two months of 1825 for which period no data are found.

He transacted public business wherever he happened to be, sometimes at his farm in Virginia, again at his summer resort on the Chesapeake, and sometimes while traveling. He signed and issued from these several places, away from the capital, numerous commissions to civil officers of the Government, exequaturs to foreign consuls, letters of credence, two letters to sovereigns, and thirty-seven pardons.

PRESIDENT JOHN Q. ADAMS was absent from the capital, during his presidential term of four years, two hundred and twenty-two days.

During such absence he performed official and public acts, signing and issuing commissions, exequaturs, pardons, proclamations, &c.

Referring to his absence in August and September, 1827, Mr. Adams, in his memoirs, volume 8, page 75, says: "I left with him (the chief clerk) some blank signatures to be used when necessary for proclamations, remission of penalties, and commissions of consuls, taking of him a receipt for the number and kind of blanks left with him, with directions to return me, when I came back, all the signed blanks remaining unused, and to keep and give me an account of all those that shall have been disposed of. This has been my constant practice with the respect to signed blanks of this description. I do the same with regard to patents and land grants."

PRESIDENT JACKSON

was absent from the capital during his presidential service of eight years five hundred and two days.

He also performed executive duties and public acts while absent.

He appears to have signed and issued while absent from the capital very many public papers, embracing commmissions, letters of credence, exequaturs, pardons, and among them four executive proclamations.

On the 26th of June, 1833, he addressed a letter from Boston to Mr. Duane, Secretary of the Treasury, giving his views at large on the removal of the "deposits" from the United States Bank and placing them in the State banks, directing that the change with all its arrangements should be if possible completed by the 15th September following, and recommending that Amos Kendall should be appointed an agent of the Treasury Department to make the necessary arrangements with the State banks. Soon after, September 23, a paper signed by the President and purporting to have been read to the Cabinet was published in the newspapers of the day. Early in the next session of Congress a resolution passed the Senate inquiring of the President whether the paper was genuine or not, and if it was published by his authority, and requesting that a copy be laid before that body.

The President replied, avowing the genuineness of the paper and that it was published by his authority, but declined to furnish a copy to the Senate on the ground that it was purely executive business and that the request of the Senate was an undue interference with the independence of the Executive, a co-ordinate branch of the Government.

In January, 1837, (26th,) he refused the privilege to a committee under a resolution of the House of Representatives to make a general investigation of the Executive Departments without specific charges, on the ground, among others, that the use of the books, papers, &c., of the Departments for such purpose would interfere with the discharge of the public duties devolving upon the heads of the different Departments and necessarily disarrange and retard the public business.

PRESIDENT VAN BUREN

was absent from the capital during his presidential term one hundred and thirty-one days.

He discharged executive duties and performed official and public acts during these absences.

Among the papers signed by President Van Buren during his absence from the seat of Government are commissions, one of these being for a United States judge of a district court, pardons, &c.

PRESIDENT TYLER

was absent from the capital during his presidential term one hundred and sixty-three days, and performed public acts and duties during such absences, signing public papers and documents to the number of twenty-eight, in which were included commissions, exequaturs, letters of credence, pardons, and one proclamation making public the treaty of 1842 between the United States and Ecuador.

PRESIDENT POLK

was absent from the capital during his presidential term thirty-seven days, and appears to have signed but two official public papers during such absence.

PRESIDENT TAYLOR

was absent from the capital during the time he served as President thirty-one days, and while absent signed two commissions, three "full powers," two exequaturs, and the proclamation of August 11, 1849, relative to a threatened invasion of Cuba or some of the provinces of Mexico.

PRESIDENT FILLMORE

was absent from the capital, during the time he served as President, sixty days. During such absence he signed pardons, commissions, exequaturs, &c.

PRESIDENT PIERCE

was absent from the capital in all during his presidential term fifty-seven days. The several periods of absence which make up this aggregate were each brief, and it does not appear that during these absences the President signed any public official documents except one pardon.

PRESIDENT BUCHANAN

was absent from the capital during his presidential term fifty-seven days, and the official papers which he is shown to have signed during such absence are three exequaturs and one letter of credence.

In addition to the public documents and papers executed by the several Presidents during their absences from the seat of Government, constant official correspondence was maintained by each with the heads of the different Executive Departments.

Mr. RANDALL. As the question involved in the original resolution and in the communication just read would seem to be a judicial one, as to the power of the President to shift for prolonged periods the place where he administers the Government, I move the message and accompanying document be referred to the Judiciary Committee and ordered to be printed; and on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no objection to that.

Mr. CONGER. Will the message and memorandum be printed in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Having been read, they will be printed in the RECORD as a matter of course.

Mr. GARFIELD. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is also to have the message and accompanying memorandum printed in the regular way as a document.

Mr. RANDALL. That is respectful and usual.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof Mr. RANDALL's motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. CATE for ten days, on account of important business, and to Mr. FORNEY and Mr. BRADFORD until the 16th instant.

WILLIAM C. SPENCER.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of William C. Spencer, late captain Seventeenth United States Infantry, no adverse report having been made thereon.

DANIEL W. SOWERS.

Mr. HUNTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3369) for the relief of Daniel W. Sowers, of Clark County, Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MURDER OF M. H. TWITCHELL, ETC.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it is alleged that M. H. Twitchell, a senator of the State of Louisiana and commissioner of the United States court for the State aforesaid, and David King, a citizen of the same State, have been within a few days foully murdered at Coushatta, on the Red River, in the State aforesaid: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the select committee appointed to investigate the affairs and accounts of the Federal office-holders in the city of New Orleans be, and are hereby, authorized and instructed to inquire into the cause of said murder or murders; and that they be authorized to send for persons and enter into a full and complete investigation of the circumstances attending said assassination, and particularly as to whether it was or was not of a political character, and that they report the result of their investigations to this House simultaneously with their other reports.

Mr. BEEBE. I offer the following amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. Although that refers to a State matter, I hope there will be no objection to the resolution.

Mr. BEEBE. I move to add the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That they also be instructed to inquire into the alleged killing of a negro man and the wounding of eight others at Indianapolis at the late election.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Never mind that. The courts will take care of murders in that State.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, made a remark which could not be heard.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman from New York will not be permitted to make a remark which we did not hear, and which we have no means of replying to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York undertook to run a race with the gavel. The Chair could not control him by any power the Chair has under the rule.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I demand the previous question.

Mr. BEEBE. Is not my amendment pending?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not, as the gentleman from New York did not yield the floor to allow it to be offered.

Mr. BEEBE. Then I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. RANDALL. Although this is a State matter and one for grand juries and State courts, I hope there will be no objection to its adoption.

Mr. BEEBE. I object.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HOAR. Is the motion to adjourn in order while the House is dividing?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is in order.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 34, noes 97.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. LEVY. I trust there will be no objection raised on this side of the House to the investigation contemplated by the resolution of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BLAND. What right have we to investigate a matter pertaining to the State courts?

Mr. LEVY. In behalf of the citizens of Louisiana, I wish to say they desire to have this investigation made as fully as possible.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. MACDOUGALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. RANDALL, at (five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. COWAN: The petition of Remy, Hedges & Walter and 38 other mercantile firms of Mansfield, Ohio, against any change in the law relating to the present mode of packing tobacco, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. DAVY: The petition of citizens of Rochester, New York, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. EGBERT: The petition of manufacturers and dealers in tobacco in Erie County, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. HARRISON: Memorial of manufacturers of tobacco in Chicago, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. HENKLE: The petition of Henry M. Hannon, for compensation for the destruction of a sloop and the use of three small boats by United States officials, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. NEW: The petition of citizens of Indiana, for such legislation as will relieve them from unjust competition by the Government in the manufacture, transportation, and sale of envelopes, newspaper wrappers, postal cards, &c., to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, the petition of John Sullivan, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. REA: Memorial of the Saint Louis Medical Society, for the fixing, after some date, several years in advance, the metric standards in the office of weights and measures at Washington that shall be the sole authorized public standard of weights and measures, to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. SEELYE: The petition of 1,030 citizens, for the acknowledgment of God and Christianity in the Constitution of the United States, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TUFTS: The petition of citizens of Iowa for the relief of Edward O'M. Condon, a citizen of the United States imprisoned in an English dungeon, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi: Papers relating to the claim of A. and P. W. Burwell, for compensation for the occupation and use of their property in Vicksburgh, Mississippi, by the United States Army, to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, papers relating to the claim of A. Burwell for compensation for property taken, used, and destroyed on his farm near Vicksburgh, Mississippi, by the United States Army, to the same committee.

Also, papers relating to the claim of Armistead Burwell for compensation for one hundred and thirty-five hogsheads and fourteen boxes of sugar seized at Vicksburgh, Mississippi in 1863 by the United States Army, to the same committee.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 5, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of March 16, 1876, a letter of the Chief of Engineers and report of Lieutenant-Colonel Q. A. Gillmore, Corps of Engineers, as to the importance and practicability of deepening the inside passage between Cumberland Sound and Saint Simon's Sound, Georgia, with estimate of probable cost, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in reply to a resolution of the Senate of the 13th of December, 1875, a letter of the Chief of Engineers and report of Lieutenant-Colonel Q. A. Gillmore, Corps of Engineers, as to the importance and practicability of improving the channel of entrance to Cumberland Sound, with estimate of probable cost; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KERNAN. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of New York, and I ask that it be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN ASSEMBLY,
Albany, April 21, 1876.

Whereas the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States renders inoperative and void the laws of this State heretofore enacted for the protection of emigrants and the prevention of their becoming a charge upon any city, town, or county of this State within five years from their landing at the port of New York, on the ground that such laws are in violation of the Constitution, and that the power to legislate on this subject is exclusively in the Federal Congress; and whereas the importance of the subject demands immediate attention: Therefore,

Resolved, (if the senate concur,) That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their influence to secure without delay the legislation necessary and requisite as well for the protection of the emigrants as for the security of the cities, towns, and counties of this State.

EDW. M. JOHNSON, Clerk.

IN SENATE, April 21, 1876.

Concurred in without amendment.

HENRY A. GLIDDON, Clerk.

Mr. KERNAN. The subject of this resolution is important to every State in which there is a port where large numbers of immigrants arrive. It is very important to the people of the State of New York. The laws of New York carefully protected both the State and the immigrant from imposition, but those laws are held void by the Supreme Court of the United States. I trust there will be consideration given to the subject by Congress during this session. It is quite important that there should be some general law which shall tend to protect the immigrant coming in, to protect him after he has landed, and also prevent him from becoming any serious burden to the State. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a memorial of citizens of Oregon and elsewhere, printers, stationers, and lithographers, remonstrating against the Government selling below cost postal cards, paper-wrappers, and envelopes, stating their objections at length; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. McDONALD presented the petition of Jacob B. Powers, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further petitions, reports of committees are in order.

TEXAS CENTENNIAL COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1749) authorizing the President to appoint two centennial commissioners for the State of Texas in lieu of those now acting, to report it without amendment. The facts in regard to this bill are such that I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. HAMILTON. I object to the consideration of the bill, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

I will state that when the bill came here from the House of Representatives, after being read at the desk it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I went to the Senator from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee, and asked that I might be heard before that committee in behalf of Mr. Parsons and Mr. Chew, the former commissioners. He promised me that I should have that privilege. I also spoke to one or two other members of the committee on the subject. It turned out, however, that the new commissioners had already been appointed when the bill came from the House; that they had been commissioned by the President and their commission had gone to Texas, and they were here the very next day after the bill came to the Senate. The bill was then suffered to lie on the table of the committee, as I was informed by one of the members of the committee, and not disturbed again.

The new commissioners went to Philadelphia to meet the commission there preparatory to opening the exhibition and the commission refused to receive them. The old commissioners are acting to-day. The Secretary of State informs me that they were removed upon the statement of the governor of Texas that they had lost their residence in Texas and had changed their citizenship to the State of New York. The commissioners take issue with the governor of the State on that point; they deny it absolutely and have sent affidavits here of the fact.

Mr. President, I want this matter fairly considered in committee, and I ask that the bill may go to the Committee on the Judiciary. I think I have been badly treated by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I must say so here in my place in the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas object to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HAMILTON. I do object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then it is not before the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I must say, after hearing the statement of the Senator, that I have been unjust to him. I had entirely forgotten my promise. The bill came from the House of Representatives some time ago, and from the information we had it appeared that the commissioners first appointed were not acting, but had left the State, and it was desirable that the State should have an opportunity of being represented. Of course I withdraw my motion to have the bill acted upon now, and move that it be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations, if that will be satisfactory to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. HAMILTON. Very well.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I trust my explanation will satisfy the Senator from Texas.

Mr. HAMILTON nodded assent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania to recommit the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 3368) to appropriate $9,000 to pay the expenses of the Select Committee to Investigate the Federal Offices in Louisiana; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 3356) authorizing the transfer of a certain appropriation; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 110) authorizing the exhibition of a life-saving station-house at the centennial exposition.

RECESS FOR CENTENNIAL CEREMONIES.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing for an adjournment of the two Houses from Tuesday, the 9th instant, to Friday, the 12th instant, to attend the centennial ceremonies at Philadelphia.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask unanimous consent to have the resolution of the House presented to the Senate at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection, the Chair will lay before the Senate the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the two Houses of Congress accept the invitation of the Centennial Commission to attend the ceremonies to be observed at the opening of the international exhibition of 1876, on the 10th instant, at Philadelphia; and that to that end when the respective Houses shall adjourn on Tuesday, the 9th instant, it shall be to meet at twelve o'clock meridian on Friday, the 12th instant.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope it will be the pleasure of the Senate to consider the resolution at the present time, if there is any disposition to consider it at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration? The Chair hears none. The question is on concurring in the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On reflection I think I will move differently from what I did yesterday on a similar topic. I move to amend the resolution by striking out "Friday, the 12th instant," as the day of reassembling, and inserting "Monday, the 15th instant," at the end of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to hear from the Senator from Vermont what the reason is for that amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall be most happy to inform my distinguished friend from New York what my reason is. It may not be a reason to him.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator's reason is the only reason I want to know.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a sufficient reason to require me to state it upon that ground, if upon no other, and I will proceed to state it. My reason is, in order to make the adjournment from Tuesday go over until the next Monday. That is the object I have in view. My reason for having that object in view, (which I suppose is the real thing which my friend from New York wishes to get at,) is that I think it would be an actual saving of time to the business of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, although that of course is a matter for them entirely. If we come back here on Friday, it is a moral certainty from our traditions and our experience that we shall not do anything until the next Monday; and if so, then it is much better that we should not be called upon to assemble here, but attend to our respective affairs, chiefly the affairs of the country in committee business, and other necessary work. That is the object which I have in view.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, my own impression is that the better thing for us to do is that proposed by the House of Representatives. It is to enable the two Houses in body, or every member of either House as an individual, to go and attend the significant historic occasion which is to begin on Wednesday next at Philadelphia. If we adjourn from Tuesday until Friday, it will enable every one to go from here on Tuesday afternoon and to remain on Wednesday and Thursday, coming back here Thursday afternoon or Thursday evening. It seems to me that that time is abundantly sufficient for doing everything which will naturally pertain to such a visit. If I am right, why should we lose in the trial which proceeds now, Friday and Saturday? What good will come of that? Will it enable members of the Senate, as a rule, to visit their homes after being two days in Philadelphia? Hardly one. The Senators from Delaware, the Senators from Maryland, the Senators from Pennsylvania perhaps, and a few others, may have such an opportunity; but to the great body of the Senate it will be wholly useless as a vacation.

The Senator from Vermont, as far as I could ascertain any fact, in the general blaze of the wit with which he illuminated this subject, intimated that the occasion was to be valuable for use in committee. That is a very standing, perhaps I might say a very stereotyped reason, for all propositions of this sort. I do not believe that while the centennial exposition is going on, on Friday and Saturday, we are likely to make as good use of time in committees as we are by adhering to this trial, which is likely at all events to be cut into by the unavoidable recess which is to be taken; and, therefore, as I want this session of Congress—and I think I express the disposition of a great majority of this body—to close as soon as it can close properly; as I do not mean myself to vote for an adjournment sine die while anything remains to be done which ought to be done or anything to be prevented which ought to be prevented, by the presence of the two Houses here, I should like to make such haste and observe such diligence as we can, without throwing away, as I think we shall, several days by this proposition without any use.

Mr. President, I ask the yeas and nays upon this proposition. I think we ought to take the question in that way.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I entirely agree with all that the Senator from New York has said touching the duty of Congress to be diligent and to stay here as long as anything remains to be done or remains to be prevented that ought to be done or ought to be prevented. But I have yet to learn that by an affectation of stupendous sitting day after day we ever gain anything. If the Senator from New York is correct in what he seems to assume, that we are not going to finish the present hearing in the matter of the impeachment before next Tuesday night, the time at which this resolution proposes to adjourn, and that that argument is to be left unfinished at that time, then I should quite agree with him that it is everybody's duty to hurry back here and drop all committee business and everything else and finish it; but I do not see what possible excuse there can be for us, so far as we can at present perceive, for having this argument go on to-day, to-morrow, Monday, and Tuesday, and not be finished then. Of course, if it is not the pleasure of the Senate to sit late, but to adjourn after three or four hours, as we did yesterday, then of course as the time is unlimited it may drag along for a long time; but if we were to do as most courts would under the circumstances, that were holding a special trial and were not sitting day by day and having fixed hours, go on just as long as the strength and endurance of the counsel and the Senators fairly would allow, then I should have little doubt that we could finish this hearing to-day and to-morrow, and certainly by Monday or at the very utmost possible by Tuesday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, to strike out "Friday, the 12th," and insert "Monday, the 15th," on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bogy, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Caperton, Clayton, Cooper, Edmunds, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Jones of Florida, Logan, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Paddock, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sherman, and Whyte—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Booth, Boutwell, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Cockrell, Conkling, Conover, Davis, Dawes, Dorsey, Eaton, Ferry, Hamilton, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Sargent, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, Windom, Withers, and Wright—36.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bruce, Cragin, Dennis, English, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Jones of Nevada, Maxey, Patterson, Randolph, Robertson, Sharon, Spencer, Stevenson, and West—17.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, if we are to have time to go to Philadelphia, and are to go there for the purpose of that opening on Wednesday, it seems to me very desirable that we should go there on Tuesday; and if we are to go there on Tuesday, that seems to me rather inconsistent with the holding of a session on that day. For that reason I should prefer that the two Houses would adjourn on Monday instead of on Tuesday.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was about to make a suggestion. The House declining to adjourn beyond Friday, we could meet on Friday with the understanding arrived at by general consent that an adjournment should take place from that day until the following Monday. That will accomplish the same purpose. I think with the Senator that we ought to be allowed a full week.

Mr. HOWE. But that was not my point at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought it was.

Mr. HOWE. The question to which I asked the attention of the Senate was how we are to have a session on Tuesday and go to Philadelphia on Tuesday? It occurs to me that we should adjourn on Monday.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I would suggest to the Senator that we can, so far as arrangements are concerned, have two legislative days, Monday and Tuesday, leaving here Tuesday evening in sufficient time to reach Philadelphia on Tuesday evening and at not a very late hour.

Mr. HOWE. At what time will the train leave here?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Say six o'clock.

Mr. INGALLS. Five o'clock.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We can leave at six o'clock and get to Philadelphia by ten o'clock.

Mr. HOWE. Upon that information I will not make the motion I was about to make.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I think the Senator from Maine is mistaken as to the time it will require to go from here to Philadelphia. We cannot get into Philadelphia comfortably by taking the ordinary trains if we go later than half past one o'clock in the day. If we start at six o'clock we shall not get there till after eleven. We cannot go there in less than five hours, especially when so many cars and trains will be on the road. We shall not be able to do any business on Tuesday. It would be much better to adjourn at once from Monday. I make that motion, to strike out "Tuesday" as the day of adjournment and insert "Monday."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves to amend the resolution by inserting "Monday" instead of "Tuesday."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If that is founded upon the supposition that we cannot leave here on Tuesday after a convenient session on that day, I wish to say that my belief is, founded upon information which I think to be accurate, that Congress can go there and be taken over in an express-train in four hours, which will leave us a legislative day, and bring us to Philadelphia without any special inconvenience as to late hours.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. There is nothing impossible under the sun; but the trip has not been made lately in four hours, and it never has been done that I know of. I am sure when the road will be full of trains, when a part of the distance it is only a single-track road, no sensible person will be willing to risk his life in going over there in that time. Let us adjourn on Monday, start at a convenient hour in the morning of Tuesday, and reach Philadelphia at a comfortable hour in the evening.

Senators will remember also that the town will be filled with people, and there will be difficulty in getting accommodations, comfortable lodgings, &c. So it will be much better for all of us to start at an early hour of the day and take one of the regular trains, for they are always safer than special trains got up to furnish people cheap travel, when the cars are overburdened with crowds. For many other reasons I submit that the motion I have made is proper.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator does not need to be reminded that the trains are now regularly leaving here in the afternoon at half past five o'clock and reaching Philadelphia at half past ten o'clock. There is no marvel about this. We can leave here at six o'clock and reach Philadelphia at ten o'clock by an express train with perfect convenience; and if there is no disposition to fritter away a day, there is no occasion for amending this resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope the resolution will pass just as it came from the House of Representatives. If we agree to adjourn on Monday, I do not know whether the arguments in the impeachment trial will be through—the counsel and the managers will know better—but I am not in favor of limiting them, and it may be necessary for us to sit on Monday in order that they may conclude their arguments, and they ought to be concluded before any other matter intervenes. I hope the resolution will pass just as it came from the House.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the time has arrived for the Senate to commence proceedings sitting as a court of impeachment, I hope we shall proceed in that capacity.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, and others. Let us have a vote on this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood that this matter was continued by common consent. Unless there is objection the Chair will put the question on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, to strike out "Tuesday" and insert "Monday."

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was concurred in.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I desire to say to Senators that I am a little careful about my life, and I have arranged to have a special car for myself, which will leave here at about one o'clock on Tuesday, in which I hope that other gentlemen who are necessary to the country will take a seat.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope the honorable Senator if he leaves the Senate will be careful to get leave of absence.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. No leave of absence will be required on Tuesday.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of twelve o'clock and thirty minutes having arrived, the legislative and executive business of the Senate will now be suspended, and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment having adjourned, then resumed its

LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes its legislative session. The Chair will lay before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 3368) appropriating $9,000 to pay the expenses of the select committee to investigate the Federal offices in Louisiana was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, it was Ordered, That Alexander C. Crawford have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate his petition and papers on leaving copies of the same with the Secretary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Laura M. Knowlton, widow of Thomas J. Knowlton, veterinary surgeon Eighth Iowa Cavalry, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted a report thereon accompanied by a bill (S. No. 816) granting a pension to Laura M. Knowlton.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session, the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and forty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 5, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I find that the Journal, as read, is incorrect in this: When the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACDOUGALL] offered a resolution in regard to certain alleged murders in the State of Louisiana, and an amendment was offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEEBE] that the investigation should also embrace the alleged killing of a negro man and the wounding of eight others at Indianapolis at the late election, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] said that the killing of that negro was caused by democrats, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] said that he was killed by democratic policemen. I do not find those declarations in the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is nothing recorded in the Journal that pertains to that question.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether the remarks of those gentlemen ought not to have been a matter of record?

Mr. HURLBUT. Do you want them recorded?

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I do want them recorded. If gentlemen will make such remarks I want them recorded.

Mr. ROBINSON. The statement was true.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot rule on the question submitted by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANDERS.] At the time the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] were made they were entirely out of order. Their remarks were not inserted in the RECORD, and it was not proper to put them in the Journal.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. Will they not appear in the RECORD if they are stated by the gentleman from Indiana to-day?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi understands that as well as the Chair. The Chair cannot entertain the motion to correct the RECORD on a matter that does not appear in the RECORD. In fact the remarks the gentleman refers to were not heard by the House and were not in order. The gavel of the Chair seemed to be the more prominent noise in the House at that time.

The Journal was then approved.

PRINTING OF DISTRICT DELINQUENT TAX LIST.

Mr. BUCKNER, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 111) as to the printing of the delinquent tax-list of the District of Columbia for 1875; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask that the joint resolution may be put upon its passage.

The joint resolution was read. It directs the commissioners of the District of Columbia to cause to be published the list of lands and lots in said District delinquent in the payment of taxes for the year 1875 in pamphlet form. It also provides that the printing thereof be done at the Government Printing Office at the net cost thereof, and that three thousand copies of said delinquent tax-list be printed and kept for distribution among the tax-payers of the District at the office of the collector of taxes of the said District.

Mr. BUCKNER. The object of this joint resolution is to carry out the provisions of the tax bill that has gone over to the Senate from this House and to reduce the cost, which has hitherto been very large, of printing delinquent tax-lists for this District. We can save the District $10,000 by the passage of this joint resolution.

Mr. WALLING. Let us pass it, then.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUCKNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VENTILATION OF THE HALL OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. YOUNG, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, submitted a report in regard to the ventilation of the Hall of the House of Representatives, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That the sum of $4,600 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of the contingent fund of the House for the purpose of securing a more thorough ventilation of the Hall of the House of Representatives; $1,000 of said sum to be expended under the direction of Professor Joseph Henry, Colonel Thomas L. Casey, Hon. Edward Clark, F. Schuman, and Professor John S. Billings; and $3,600 under the direction of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, in such manner as they may deem proper in carrying out the purpose hereinbefore indicated.

The resolution was adopted, and the report was ordered to be printed, and to lie on the table.

PACKING TOBACCO.

Mr. WALLING, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of Brooks & Houston, Isaac Eberly & Co., and nine other firms, engaged in the manufacture and sale of tobacco, of the city of Columbus, Ohio, against any change in the mode of packing tobacco; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The memorial is as follows:

Memorial of manufacturers and dealers against any change in the mode of packing tobacco.

To the honorable members of the Senate and House of Representatives:

The undersigned, manufacturers and dealers in tobacco, of Columbus, State of Ohio, respectfully, but earnestly, petition your honorable bodies to permit the law regulating the manner of packing tobacco to remain as it is at present. They would respectfully represent that a change in the packing of fine-cut chewing tobacco, forbidding the use of large wooden packages, would seriously derange the tobacco business of the country, and cause widespread dissatisfaction to the consumers, who would have just cause to protest against the greatly increased cost of their tobacco, occasioned by the proposed change in packing, with a knowledge that no portion of such a grievous tax would go into the public Treasury. It is requisite that this kind of tobacco should be kept in a soft, moist condition, which is best accomplished by the use of the large package. No reason can possibly be given for this attempt to radically break up an established trade of the country on the ground of any failure in the payment of tax which we believe is paid to the fullest extent.

INFRINGEMENT OF PATENTS.

Mr. HURLBUT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3370) to amend the statutes in relation to damages for infringement of patents, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour begins at twenty-three minutes after twelve o'clock, and this being Friday the business of the morning hour is the call of committees for reports of a private nature. The call rests with the Committee on Private Land Claims.

CALEB L. BRAYTON.

Mr. AINSWORTH, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1997) to grant title to certain lands to the heirs of Caleb L. Brayton; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF ZACHARIAH B. WASHBURN.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3093) for the relief of the legal representatives of Zachariah B. Washburn, deceased.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am directed by the committee unanimously to report this bill, and I ask that it be passed. There is no question about it; its object is only to perfect the title to about one hundred and fifteen acres of land where, owing to a technical defect, the Department is prevented from granting title.

Mr. BLOUNT. I object.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection. This is a bill to perfect a title merely, and it is unanimously reported. The Government has no interest in it at all; the difficulty in the way of perfecting the title is a technical one. I have here a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office in reference to the case.

Mr. BLOUNT. Let the letter be read.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I call for the reading of the letter of the Commissioner.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will first be read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Whereas on the 20th day of January, 1836, the said Zachariah B. Washburn did enter and purchase, of the proper officers, the west part of the northeast fractional quarter of section 24, in township 18 north, of range 11 west of the second principal meridian, in the district of public lands then subject to sale at Danville, in the State of Illinois, and did thereupon receive a certificate of purchase therefor, in which the said land was erroneously described as the northwest fractional quarter of said section 24, and also a patent therefor was afterward issued to the said Washburn, in which the said lot of land was also erroneously described as aforesaid: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the Commissioner of the General Land Office issue to the legal representatives of the said Zachariah B. Washburn a patent for the said west part of the northeast quarter of said section 24, in the township and range aforesaid, and that the preamble above herein be recited in said patent.

Mr. BLOUNT. I now ask for the reading of the letter of the Commissioner.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., June 17, 1875.

SIR: Your letter of the 7th ultimo has been received, relative to cash entry No. 4147 by Zachariah B. Washburn, January 20, 1836, described as the northwest fractional quarter of section 24, township 18 north, range 11 west of the second principal meridian, Illinois, and said to contain 115.13 acres.

In reply I have to state that from a thorough investigation of this case the following facts appear, namely: That Zachariah B. Washburn paid for 115.13 acres, and received a patent therefor, November 1, 1839; that it is probable a clerical error was made in filling up the entry papers describing the tract as northwest fractional quarter of section 24, when it should have been described as west part of northeast fractional quarter of said section 24.

This appears from the fact that at a subsequent period, namely, November 29, 1836, the said Washburn, with John H. Adams, entered together the greater part of the northwest quarter of said section 24, namely, east half of northwest quarter and northwest quarter of northwest quarter of section 24, as per certificates Nos. 6821 and 6822, which tracts were patented to said Washburn and Adams, November 1, 1839.

Hence there can be little doubt that Washburn intended to enter the west part of northeast fractional quarter of said section 24, containing 115.13 acres, as per certificate No. 4147.

The plat of survey, a diagram from which is hereto attached, shows no other legal subdivision of said section 24 having the same area of 115.13 acres.

On the 12th of November, 1872, the register at Springfield, Illinois, was instructed, in relation to this case, to call upon Mr. Washburn or his grantee to surrender the patent describing the northwest fractional quarter of section 24, and forward it to this Office, accompanied by a deed of relinquishment of the land therein conveyed, together with a certificate of the county recorder of non-conveyance and non-incumbrance of the same, and that upon receipt thereof a new patent would be issued for the west part of northeast fractional quarter of said section 24.

It appears by a communication from you to the register at Springfield, dated March 25, 1871, that said Zachariah B. Washburn has been dead for many years, as also the administrator of his estate; that his heirs have left the country, and that no trace of the patent can be found.

In view of the above showing I have to state that, without being in possession of the patent, this Office can take no further action in the case, and the only remedy left is for the present grantee to purchase the said west part of northeast fractional quarter from the United States, at the rate of $1.25 per acre, or to apply to Congress for a special act authorizing this Office to issue a patent to him for said tract.

Respectfully,

S. S. BURDETT, Commissioner.

E. S. TERRY, Esq.,
Danville, Illinois.

Town. 18 N., Range 11 W., 2d P. M., Ill.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I now ask for the reading of the letter referred to in that communication.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 25, 1876.

SIR: In the matter of your reference of a letter from this office addressed to E. S. Terry, esq., of Danville, Illinois, dated June 17, 1875, relative to cash entry No. 4147, by Zachariah B. Washburn, dated January 20, 1836, I have to state that this office has no legal authority to take any other action in the case than that expressed in the letter above referred to, which is herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

U. J. BAXTER,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. J. G. CANNON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BLOUNT. I believe the report of the committee is unanimous.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia withdraws his point of order, because it was properly a point of order.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NORTHWESTERN IMPROVEMENT COMPANY.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 176) to authorize the Northwestern Improvement Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, to enter upon the Menomonee Indian reservation and improve the Oconto River, its branches and tributaries; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WINNEBAGO INDIANS OF WISCONSIN.

Mr. MORGAN also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1296, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 112) to aid the Winnebago Indians of Wisconsin to obtain subsistence by agricultural pursuits and to promote their civilization; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the resolution of the House of Representatives accepting the invitation of the Centennial Commission to attend the ceremonies to be observed at the opening of the international exhibition of 1876, on the 10th instant, at Philadelphia, and that to that end when the respective Houses shall adjourn on Tuesday the 9th instant it shall be to meet at twelve o'clock m. on Friday, the 12th instant.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the resolution of the House in relation to the distribution of the reports of the United States geographical survey west of the one hundredth meridian.

The message further announced that the Senate was ready to proceed upon the impeachment of William W. Belknap, and to receive the managers on the part of the House, and that the Senate Chamber was prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

BENJAMIN L. CORNISH.

Mr. HURLBUT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 560) for the relief of Benjamin L. Cornish, late second lieutenant of the Twenty-second Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. HURLBUT also, from the same committee, reported adversely in the following cases; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 1137) for the relief of Maria B. Lemmon;

The petition of John C. Griffin;

The memorial of John R. Roche;

A bill (H. R. No. 638) for the benefit of Elkannah Huddleston;

A bill (H. R. No. 502) for the relief of Charles D. C. Williams, late a captain of marine artillery;

The petition of Elijah Cudgington, praying Congress to grant compensation for services as a scout and spy;

The petition of Thomas Raines, asking compensation for services rendered the United States;

The petition of Captain James A. Dougherty, asking pay for services as an officer of the United States Army;

The petition of William Witherow, asking pay for services in the United States Army; and

The petition of Mrs. Jane Jamieson, of Green County, Missouri, for relief.

BOUNTIES TO SOLDIERS.

Mr. HURLBUT moved that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the following petitions, and that the same be laid on the table:

The petition of 39 citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, asking Congress to grant one hundred and sixty acres of land to all soldiers who have served in the military or marine service of the United States for a period of thirty days and received an honorable discharge; and

The petition of Benjaman Newcomb and 65 others, of Canton, Pennsylvania, late soldiers of the United States, praying for a grant of one hundred and sixty acres of land and an appropriation of $200 in money to each and all soldiers who served for the term of thirty days either in the military or marine service of the United States and received an honorable discharge therefrom.

The motion of Mr. HURLBUT was agreed to.

LEAVENWORTH STREET RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. TERRY, from the same committee, reported adversely upon the following; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed:

A bill (S. No. 25) granting the right of way to the Leavenworth Street Railroad Company across the Fort Leavenworth military reservation; and

A bill (H. R. No. 156) granting the right of way to the Leavenworth Street Railroad Company across the Fort Leavenworth military reservation.

NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY OF CALIFORNIA.

Mr. TERRY also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (S. No. 153) to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through the United States arsenal grounds near Benicia, California.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The bill grants the right of way, not exceeding one hundred feet in width, through the lands of the United States included in the military reservation near Benicia, in the State of California, to the Northern Railway Company for the purpose of constructing a railroad, and provides that the said right of way, and the width and location thereof through said lands, and the regulations for operating said railroad within the limits of the reservation so as to prevent all danger to public property, shall be submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War prior to any entry on said lands, or the commencement of the construction of said works; that whenever said rights of way shall cease to be used for the purposes aforesaid, the same shall revert to the United States, and that the right to repeal, alter, or amend the act is reserved to Congress.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TERRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVAL FISCAL AGENTS IN LONDON.

Mr. BEEBE. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, without printing, a communication just received from the Secretary of the Navy.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore accordingly laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in response to a House resolution of March 21, 1876, copies of all accounts of the Navy Department with fiscal agents of that Department in London, for each year since 1868; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department.

KEY WEST, FLORIDA.

Mr. TERRY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (S. No. 391) to authorize the Secretary of War to purchase a parcel of land on the island of Key West, Florida.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. RANDALL. I reserve the point of order on that bill, as to its being a public bill.

Mr. TERRY. Let the bill be read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to purchase, for the use of the United States, at a price which shall be agreed upon between him and the owners, and not to exceed $2,000, a certain parcel or tract not exceeding five acres of land claimed by W. C. Maloney and wife, lying and situate on the island of Key West, Florida, and adjoining the military reservation on said island: Provided, That the title of said parties to said property shall be found to be in all respects good and valid in law and equity. And this authority shall expire at the end of one year from the passage of this act; and the necessary amount of money to pay for the said land, in the event of purchase, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 2. That if the Secretary of War and the owners of said property shall be unable to agree upon a price to be paid by the United States for said land, or if for any reason the United States shall fail to acquire the title to the same within a reasonable time after the passage of this act, then it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to cause the possession of said property, if the same belongs to the said Maloney and wife, or such part of it as is now or may be occupied by the United States, to be restored to them.

Mr. RANDALL. The point of order applies both to the fact that the bill contains an appropriation and that it is a public bill. But the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TERRY] tells me that the Secretary of War is desirous to have this bill passed; and therefore I withdraw my point.

Mr. RUSK. I renew the point. I must object to any public bill being reported under this call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order being raised, the Chair feels bound to sustain it, because to allow the presentation of public bills under this call would confuse the two Calendars and give rise to inextricable confusion. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

MAJOR FOSTER A. HIXON.

Mr. THORNBURGH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 333) for the relief of Major Foster A. Hixon, late a paymaster in the Army; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

SIGNAL-SERVICE OBSERVATIONS FOR PUBLIC HEALTH.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 222) to extend the observations of the Signal Service of the Army so as to benefit the public health.

Mr. RANDALL. That is a public bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is certainly a public bill. The Chair must sustain the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the Chair that he consider the point of order as raised against all bills of this character.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been the practice of previous occupants of the chair to rule out all bills of this character without the point being specifically raised in each case. The Chair will follow that practice.

JOHN HEBERER.

Mr. HARDENBERGH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 2082) for the relief of John Heberer; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

THE NATION'S DEBT TO ELIZA POTTER.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. By the unanimous direction of the Committee on Military Affairs I report back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 384) for the relief of Mrs. Eliza Potter, widow of Lorenzo T. Potter, deceased, late of Charleston, South Carolina.

The bill was read. It appropriates $20,000 to Mrs. Eliza Potter, widow of Lorenzo T. Potter, deceased, late of Charleston, South Carolina.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Mr. Speaker, it has fallen to my lot, by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, to report as approved by them this bill for the relief of Mrs. Eliza Potter. It is a Senate bill, having received the unanimous sanction of the Senate, was referred to the Committee of the House on Military Affairs, and is now reported to the House, not alone for its respectful consideration, but its kindly and generous approval, and I ask in its behalf the attention of Representatives.

It is an anomalous case—stands by itself—and should not be determined by the common rules which apply to losses sustained in war. The evidence before the committee is sufficient to justify us in recommending an appropriation for the relief of the petitioner.

Here was a citizen of the United States in affluent circumstances, fulfilling all his obligations of fealty and duty to the Government for protection in his person and property, residing in a State the people of which had rebelled against the national authority. Amid the tempest of indignation and hate which is gathering about him he maintains his loyalty. His faith and courage never forsake him. He ministers to the sufferings of Union soldiers, prisoners of war; supplies them with money, dresses their wounds, alleviates their pain, and cheers them with the hope of restoration to friends and liberty; and this not for days or weeks, but for months and years.

As the numbers increase and the horrors of war are multiplied, he lavishly expends his time and means in the establishment of hospitals, planning methods of escape, devoting his best energies to mitigating the calamities which attend the fierce conflict of arms. He exposes his life, endures privation and losses, his property is destroyed by national as well as confederate troops, until, reduced to penury and maddened by the frightful experience he has endured, reason fled from her throne and he died a lunatic, bereft when living of all that can render life desirable and without even the consolation of knowing that his country would provide his remains even with a grave. Such was his career, such his history.

Listen, and I will tell you more. His widow, disconsolate and broken down with grief, appeals to that country for a return of only so much of property as will enable her to pass the remainder of her life in repose and comparative tranquillity, and my judgment affirms the suggestions of sympathy and informs me it would be an act of righteousness and justice to contribute to her relief.

Sir, there was a time when this man, this family, were in the enjoyment of every blessing a kind Providence vouchsafes to the most favored of his creatures: position, wealth, and troops of friends. A time came when the life of his country was in danger; when darkness, dismay, and doubt struck terror into the firmest hearts; when friends were faltering and enemies became exultant; when the eye of the patriot was dim with tears and the heart of the philanthropist was heavy with sorrow. With Roman fortitude he adhered to the fortunes of his country and sacrificed his own.

When such an example is presented we cannot disregard the obligations of justice. We may not restore home or lands or houses or kindred; we may not rekindle hopes which have been blasted or renew affections which have been crushed; but we can establish the precedent that this Government will recognize those claims which are based on signal services rendered to the Republic, and that when a citizen has made extraordinary sacrifices involving the total loss of his property his family shall not be permitted to linger in suffering and want.

If the State of New Jersey under the law of necessity had destroyed the property of one of her citizens she would have made compensation for the loss, for the obligation of the State is to protect. But to what State could a citizen of South Carolina apply for the reparation of losses sustained in defending the General Government? South Carolina had repelled the allegiance of all those who bore fealty to the Union.

This petitioner was an enemy to the confederacy, and as such his property was beyond protection—nay, became forfeited. But he was a loyal citizen of the United States, and had a right to security in his person and property, for allegiance and protection are reciprocal.

If there is any reason why, under our Constitution and laws, we are prohibited from recognizing the prayer of this petitioner, then one of the highest attributes of sovereignty is not inherent in the national authority.

It will be time enough to listen to the suggestions of policy when this House finds itself unable to determine the righteousness of matters submitted for its judgment. If we have the power to destroy property we have the power to compensate the owner for it. Whether we will compensate or not depends upon the facts presented. If we shall pass this bill it will be no precedent except where the same facts have occurred, and wherever they have I am in favor of granting relief.

The exigencies of war open the door to innumerable frauds. Individuals advance their interests to the detriment of the public welfare. A good cause may be imperiled by the selfish conduct of those who hasten to change the government when their interests are jeopardized and refuse to submit to any sacrifices for the preservation of the national authority.

If no distinction is to be made between those who cheerfully surrender their lives and their property in order to strengthen the arm of Government in the hour of danger and those who embrace such an hour as the opportunity for their lust of gain, then are republics so far contemptible. They cannot appeal to the noblest instincts which animate our nature.

The nation which deems it impolitic to distinguish between right and wrong in the conduct of its citizens cannot command the devotion or stimulate the enthusiasm of the noblest and best among them. What secured for Rome those marvelous exhibitions of self-sacrifice which adorn the pages of her history and inflame the mind to generous and ardent sympathy?

To be a Roman citizen was even among barbarians a defense more impenetrable than armor of triple brass. On the desert, in the mountains, among strange races, he who bore that character was protected by an empire that never permitted the meanest of its subjects to feel himself abandoned. It was this consciousness which inspired heroic resolution, gave constancy in suffering, fidelity in temptation, and consolation in death. And shall the American citizen never feel emotions of gratitude toward his Government as such? Is the mighty arm that has subdued a continent powerless to defend one single family? Let it be known and appreciated that this Government represents the concentrated will of the entire people and has a moral as well as a physical power to exercise; that it has not been reserved for great empires in the past to encourage disinterested and generous impulses, and that our Christian civilization is as prompt to recognize the higher virtues of the individual citizen as it is able and willing to reward them.

Mr. Speaker, in the endeavor to discharge the high duties which devolve upon us here, I trust to have discarded in the review of this case all else than the simple obligations of duty to my country. While the records of our unhappy conflict on the fields of civil war are replete with the devotion of woman to the alleviation of its woes, no matter on which side had contended the stricken heroes, this bright and beautiful example of heroic devotion seems to stand aloof from all others in the intensity of its devotion, the wealth of its affection, and the beauty and brilliancy of its example.

Weary and worn with care and trial, a woman clad in the habiliments of mourning for six years past has wended her way to these halls of legislation for the relief so eminently her due. Three times the Senate of her country has approved her case and sent to this House a bill for her relief, and as often has it been postponed, not that it was unjust, but that in the hurry of legislation attention was not given it. With a more than Spartan valor she gave of her time and means to alleviate the sorrows of the wounded and the dying. With a consciousness of her own wealth she lavished all she could utilize in hospital and in prison upon the weary and the wounded, nor limited her charities, her benevolence, and her care to creed or kind. Her cause was for the Union, but in the melting tenderness of a woman's heart she bound alike the wounds of the soldier who was suffering, whether for the Union or for the confederacy. It is a God-like charity which dispenses its awards, and asks not by what bullet stricken amid the iron hail of war.

In behalf of this award the noblest of the land have yielded their expressions of sympathy. Sumner gave to it his unfaltering support. BURNSIDE certifies with earnestness to the debt this nation owes Eliza Potter; and acting Vice-President Wade, when in high authority, pronounced his unqualified approval, and at this session has urged with all his energy that in such a case as this the nation should hasten to discharge its obligation and acknowledge the service so faithfully rendered.

It is a record of woman's work in the civil war. Let it be rewarded as a proud nation should reward it; and by the passage of this bill let this House say that in giving all of wealth and family and home to her country that country will not desert her, but give solace and comfort to her advancing years by an offering substantial upon the altar of its patriotism and its affection. She asks no reward for long service by day or by night in the soldiers' hospital, soothing the wounded and holding converse with the souls of the departing so far as mortals may. Such deeds may not be measured by earthly values; but, when all else of her fortune has been lost, she has a right to ask that you return to her the simple moneys spent in the purchase of medicines administered by her and others in Carolina's hospitals when beyond the reach of the aid or comfort of that Government for whose wounded honor they were suffering in agony and want.

Various characteristics have been awarded this House since entering upon its career of legislation, but I have that faith in its generosity and that reliance upon its magnanimity to believe that, however else we may differ in the common effort to advance the better interests of our country, here at least we may join hands and hearts and votes in the interests of patriotism, of benevolence, and of charity.

Pass this bill, Mr. Speaker, and while you will relieve the suffering you give an example for history at once glowing and beautiful.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARDENBERGH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HEIRS OF GUSTAVUS B. HORNER.

Mr. COOK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the memorial for the benefit of the heirs of Gustavus B. Horner, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

LIEUTENANT JAMES RANDON.

Mr. COOK also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of Lieutenant James Randon, of Grant County, Kentucky, for compensation for services as lieutenant; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

DAVID I. EZEKIEL.

Mr. COOK also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 1882) to authorize the President of the United States to promote First Lieutenant David I. Ezekiel, of the Fourth Regiment of Infantry, United States Army; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM WELSH.

Mr. COOK also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 1682) for the relief of William Welsh, late a captain in the Twenty-fifth Infantry, United States Army; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM M. MOORE.

Mr. COOK also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 762) for the relief of William M. Moore; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LAWRENCE A. WILLIAMS.

Mr. COOK also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1847 a bill (H. R. No. 3371) to place Lawrence A. Williams, late major Sixth Cavalry, United States Army, upon the retired list of the Army; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. COOK. That bill passed the last House unanimously, but went to the Senate too late for action there. It is a meritorious case, and has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. I ask that it be now put upon its passage.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the President of the United States to place on the list of retired officers of the Army the name of Lawrence A. Williams, late major Sixth Cavalry, United States Army, with the rank of major; provided the said Lawrence A. Williams shall be entitled to pay as such only from the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. HURLBUT. That word "directed" should be stricken from the bill.

Mr. COOK. The word "directed" is not in the substitute.

Mr. HURLBUT. If the substitute contains the objectionable word "directed" I must object.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I make the point of order that the bill under the rule must go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is obnoxious to the point of order and must go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, as it makes an appropriation.

Mr. COOK. It merely restores this officer to the Army list.

Mr. BANNING. It does not make any appropriation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will read the rule:

All proceedings touching appropriations of money, and all bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, shall be first discussed in a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. BANNING. This requires no appropriation of money.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It authorizes the payment of money already appropriated or to be appropriated.

Mr. BANNING. He gets no pay up to this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will sustain the point of order out of abundant caution. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MILITARY POSTS, YELLOWSTONE AND MUSCLESHELL RIVERS.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report a bill (H. R. No. 2118) to provide for the construction of military posts on the Yellowstone and Muscleshell Rivers, with the recommendation that it do pass, and to ask for its consideration at this time. I desire to make a statement in reference to this matter, which I think will be satisfactory.

Mr. RANDALL. Prior to the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. THORNBURGH. If the point of order be made against the bill, it will hold good.

The preamble recites that Lieutenant-General Philip H. Sheridan and Brigadier-General Alfred H. Terry have, in their reports to the Secretary of War for the year 1875, set forth the great importance and immediate necessity of the construction of military posts at certain points on the Yellowstone and Muscleshell Rivers, in the Territory of Montana, and in the military department of Dakota, and such recommendations have been transmitted to Congress with the approval of the Secretary of War.

The bill then appropriates the sum of $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the construction of such military posts or depots, at such points as may be selected by the Secretary of War.

Mr. RUSK. That is general legislation, and not in order on private-bill day.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to state that this bill involves a large expenditure of money. I suppose it is right in itself that these two new posts should be established on the Yellowstone and Muscleshell Rivers, but the same bill ought also to embrace a provision for the vacation of several other posts, so we may not leave anything to uncertainty. If we do establish these two new posts, then the six posts which are not now necessary, according to the same evidence upon which this bill is founded, ought to be abolished.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I withdraw the bill if it cannot be considered by unanimous consent. It is important that it should be considered at this time.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman will provide in his bill for the vacation of the six or eight other posts mentioned by the same evidence not to be necessary, I will not object.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I desire to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the Military Committee have considered this question, and believe the particular post to be abandoned by the establishment of these new posts had better be left to the discretion of the military authority.

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing to leave it to their discretion with the assertion in the bill that they shall vacate these six or eight posts.

Mr. MAGINNIS. As soon as possible.

Mr. THORNBURGH. They have said to the Committee on Military Affairs they will abandon certain other posts on the establishment of these new posts.

Mr. BANNING. If the bill is amended as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania it may be passed without objection this morning, and it is important that it should be passed at an early day.

Mr. RANDALL. We have considered this subject in the Committee on Appropriations, and I am not speaking my own judgment, but that of the committee. I understood the gentleman from Tennessee to concur in the opinion these other posts were not necessary.

Mr. HURLBUT. I object to any debate upon a subject not before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is nothing before the House, the point of order having been made and sustained that this is a public and not a private bill.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I withdraw the report.

JOHN AMMAHAIE OR AMMAHE.

Mr. STRAIT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1075) directing the Second Auditor to settle the pay and bounty account of John Ammahaie or Ammahe, with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report ordered to be printed.

JAMES G. WILLIAMS.

Mr. MILLIKEN, from the Committee on War Claims, made an adverse report on the petition of James G. Williams, of Memphis, Tennessee, for pay as scout and guide and for remuneration for property lost in the service of the United States; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

SEWELL B. CORBETT.

Mr. CABELL, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, as a substitute for House bill No. 1119, a bill (H. R. No. 3372) for the relief of Sewell B. Corbett, of Alexandria County, Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOSKINS. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on War Claims——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has made a mistake in calling the Committee on War Claims. Other reports from that committee will be received when it is called in its order. The call rests with the Committee on Naval Affairs.

There were no reports from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REAR-ADMIRAL JOHN J. ALMY.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the joint resolution (S. No. 2) authorizing Rear-Admiral John J. Almy, United States Navy, to accept a decoration from the King of the Hawaiian Islands; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CÉLESTE M'GOWAN, NOW FREYTET.

Mr. BLAND, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2600) granting a pension to Mrs. Céleste McGowan, now Freytet; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ROBERT M. BARR.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported back the petition for bounty of Robert M. Barr, father of William B. Barr, deceased, late a private of Company E, Seventy-third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

ESTHER P. FOX.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 1238) granting a pension to Esther P. Fox; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COCHRANE. I ask the Chair whether the morning hour has not expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. COCHRANE. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. RUSK. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion until the call of the committees is completed.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. HOSKINS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to present two reports from the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. COCHRANE. The regular order having been called I must insist on my motion.

Mr. HOSKINS. I desire to say that before the next regular day for the call of committees for reports of a private nature I may be absent, having been appointed as a member of the investigating committee to go to New Orleans. In view of that fact I ask unanimous consent to present the two reports which I hold in my hand.

Mr. COCHRANE. In consideration of the fact that the gentleman from New York expects to be absent on the next day when committees are called for reports of a private nature, I yield to him; but will yield no further.

Mr. RUSK. I shall object to the gentleman yielding to any one unless the call shall proceed.

The question being taken on Mr. COCHRANE'S motion, there were—ayes 67, noes 60; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, under the rule, ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. HOSKINS and Mr. COCHRANE.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 76, noes 72.

Mr. SINNICKSON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOSKINS. I now ask unanimous consent to get these reports off my hands before I go South.

Mr. DUNNELL. I object.

Mr. COCHRANE. I hope there will be no objection to the gentleman reporting these matters, as he expects to be absent by the order of the House.

Mr. DUNNELL. I withdraw the objection.

HARRY E. EASTMAN.

Mr. HOSKINS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3374) for the relief of Harry E. Eastman, late lieutenant-colonel Second Regiment Wisconsin Cavalry Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SUSAN E. WILLARD.

Mr. HOSKINS also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3373) for the relief of Susan D. Willard, widow of Sylvester D. Willard, of New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. NEW. I am in the same situation as the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOSKINS,] being a member of the same committee which is to proceed to New Orleans. With the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COCHRANE] and of the House, I will be glad to submit some reports.

Mr. RUSK. If the Committee on Invalid Pensions shall be permitted to report also, I will interpose no objection; otherwise I must.

Mr. COCHRANE. I hope the same privilege will be extended to the gentleman from Indiana as has been to the gentleman from New York, as he is a member of the same committee, and expects soon to leave for Louisiana.

Mr. RUSK. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania then yield for reports of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to go on the Calendar?

Mr. COCHRANE. I cannot yield for that without yielding for many other things.

Mr. RUSK. Then I object.

Mr. NEW. I submit that the gentleman's objection comes too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair must rule that the House has already by vote resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and without unanimous consent the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NEW] cannot be entertained.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The House, pursuant to order, resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. SAYLER in the chair.

ARIEL K. EATON AND JAMES D. JENKINS.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2829) for the relief of Ariel K. Eaton and James D. Jenkins.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to allow and pay to Ariel K. Eaton, of Osage, Iowa, late receiver of the United States land office at Decorah and Osage, in the State of Iowa, the sum of $3,600, on
